Architects declare war on the red tape holding back investment

Professionals have launched an initiative to make the authorities aware of the difficulties experienced by potential investors

Architects in the province of Malaga have joined construction sector professionals in their pleas for the authorities to loosen red tape involved in property investment and development. The Colegio de Arquitectos, the association that represents architects, has set up a committee to identify the main administrative obstacles that are holding back the industry just as it is starting to take off after years of crisis. Their aim is to make the local and regional authorities aware of the problems their bureaucratic procedures are causing and to urge them to make changes to speed up the process. The association is also calling for the criteria used by different authorities to be unified. P5

Malaga, facing up to relegation as a city too

ANTONIO M. ROMERO

Twitter: @amontillaromero

With the football club relegated to the second division, authorities and experts are fearing a blow to the local economy, as well as to the city's image

MALAGA. Malaga Football Club brought an end to a decade-long run in the top flight of Spanish football, playing their final La Liga game against Getafe on Saturday ahead of relegation to the second division. While this will have obvious repercussions for the club, both the city and province will also, in a way, be relegated as its effects will be felt across various sectors of the economy.

According to experts consulted by SUR, Malaga's relegation from what many consider to be the best football league in the world will affect the city's future, given the impact of the sport from a touristic, economic and image viewpoint.

Taking the cases of cities such as Zaragoza, Valladolid, Murcia and Alicante (whose teams are now either playing in the second or third tiers) as examples, estimations from the Chambers of Commerce in Spain put losses due to relegation anywhere between five and 28 million euros. The total figures depend on the size of the city and the stadium, as well as the number of hotel beds available. In Malaga's case, due to its growing reputation on a global stage, the effect could be even greater.

The principal way a team's relegation directly affects a city's economy is through the decreased crowds at the games, whether fans (both home and away), or professionals (coaching staff, directors, officials or journalists). The absence from the schedule of major games such as Real Madrid, Barcelona or Atlético Madrid will be where the numbers show the greatest difference. This decreased traffic impacts on the hotel, catering and transport industries which, in turn, leads to job losses.

President of the Malaga Confederation of Business Owners (CEM), Javier González de Lara, highlights that having a La Liga side in a city is the equivalent of 25,000 overnight stays, primarily in low season, and 50,000 visitors.

For Plácido Rodríguez, professor of Economics at the University of Oviedo and director of the Fundación Observatorio Económico del Deporte (FOED), the relegation of a football side has "a negative impact" on a city. He points out that takings at the stadium will be a lot lower as the number of season ticket holders, the prices that they pay and the cost of tickets for one-off games will all be lower, even if this saving on the part of fans "will be redistributed" around the rest of Malaga.

Stadium revenue aside, in his view, the biggest shortfall will come in the form of television broadcasting rights. For a medium-sized club like Malaga, TV money represents about a half of all income. However, with relegation, this figure will diminish significantly and that will have a knock-on effect on the province's GVA (gross value added). "This is money that comes from outside Malaga and its impact on the economy is very significant," he says.

Rodríguez goes on to explain that until this point, Malaga were receiving a little over 55 million euros from TV rights - a number which will fall to around eight or nine next season. This loss, he adds, will be covered somewhat by the so-called relegation 'parachute payments', of between nine and ten million euros, that the club will receive. In total, "Malaga CF will lose around 38 million euros from TV money, a quantity that will be reflected in the GVA," he says.

"Relegation will also create a loss for Malaga city as a brand," adds Rodríguez, as "the football club will be spoken about less in the media". The situation is not helped, he believes, by the current state of affairs at the club, with a frosty relationship existing between the fans and owner Sheikh Abdullah Al-Thani.

"It's not positive"

Experts consulted at advertising and marketing firm, El Cuartel, agree that being outside La Liga "is not positive" for the image of the city as "a lot of media coverage is lost". While playing at the top level "is a great attribute" for a city, they say that "the values of Malaga as a city are firmly established and not linked to the fortunes of the club". That said, "it's always better to have a first division team because of the media attention it brings on a global level".

Also working on this hypothesis, Javier González de Lara thinks that the adverse affects suffered by the

Marbella, hoping for a historic promotion

Malaga province's second team, Marbella FC, could be about to join Malaga in the second division. Promotion for the team, who are currently in the play-offs, could provide a massive boost for the town, further promoting it as a destination for sport. Though the leap to Segunda from Segunda B is not the most lucrative, the difference in crowds could nonetheless still have a knock-on effect for businesses across the town.

'Malaga brand' will depend a lot on how long the team stays out of La Liga and whether the club can convey an impression of stability and recover lost confidence: "At the CEM, we find the situation at Malaga CF very worrying, not only because of what is happening on the pitch, but by the apparent instability behind the scenes, both economically and in terms of leadership.

"Malaga business owners, however, hope that the team will return to the top flight, in view of the economic and social effects it will have on a province as dynamic and competitive as Malaga, which deserves to be represented in the best league in the world."

From an institutional perspective, president of the Malaga provincial government, Elias Bendodo, stresses

"the importance" of having a La Liga team in the province from a tourist perspective. "Teams are inevitably linked to the territory they are in, creating a strong link between the city or province and the fans. For this reason it is important to have as successful a team as possible and that the owners, the staff and the players push themselves to maintain a good level all season," he says.

Bendodo adds that Malaga has "an elite team, an elite city and province and an elite fan base" and calls upon everyone to support the team in the second division while at the same time calling on the owners of the club to "match the greatness of the city and this magnificent province".

José Luis Ruiz Espejo, the Junta regional government delegate in the province, says that the financial benefits of having a La Liga team are "unquestionable" given its impact across various sectors.

Ruiz Espejo believes that relegation, as well as its impact on the mood of the fans, will affect the economy and image of the city. "Malaga's image is a very strong one in tourism, culture and technology and that should be matched in sport, especially in football, where we shouldn't only be thinking about getting back into La Liga, but also into European competitions".

This is a theme repeated by the city's mayor, Francisco de la Torre, who calls this "very bad news for everyone". He says: "If a city like Malaga is among the best in Spain across so many areas, it's only logical that our sports teams should be the same."

Police bring down group which exploited undocumented foreign workers in restaurants

The dozen victims were recruited in either India or Pakistan to work 12-hour shifts in restaurants for as little as 400 euros

ÁLVARO FRÍAS / JUAN CANO
MALAGA. A total of 39 arrests have been made to bring down a criminal gang allegedly responsible for exploiting the precarious situation of a dozen undocumented migrants on the Costa del Sol. This was a result of the so-called 'Operación Samaka' which started in 2017 after a worker at a Pakistani restaurant filed a police complaint over his working conditions. According to the central government representative in Malaga, Miguel Briones, who gave a press conference on Wednesday, the National Police's investigations led to the arrests and the liberation of 12 victims. He explained that the gang looked to recruit the victims in their country of origin, principally in India and Pakistan, offering them work in Spain in one of five restaurants. Once here, according to investigators, they were forced to work up to 12 hours a day, without a day off, for just 400 or 500 euros a month. The workers were also told that if there were work inspections, they should identify themselves as others who were living in Spain legally and were registered with social security. According to the investigation, another way that the organisation maintained this exploitation, was through organising marriages of convenience that would regularise their situation. They would charge between eight and ten thousand euros to organise a marriage to a Spanish citizen, normally older women with money problems, keeping the employees indebted, working for several months without pay to pay it off. Searches were carried out at the five restaurants as well as at the home of the man believed to be orchestrating the operation. 170,000 euros in cash and a top-of-the range vehicle were seized. Of the 29 arrests, 19 were made in Malaga, two in Torremolinos, eight in Fuengirola, five in Marbella, one in Coín and four in Mijas. Those arrested are accused of document fraud, crimes against the rights of foreign citizens and workers and tax and social security fraud.

The sector is concerned by the arrival of companies such as Uber and Cabify. :: FRAN ACEVEDO

Taxis improve their services to be better than the competition

New innovations include a single contact number, a mobile phone app, modernised fleet and becoming the official transport at events

:: FRANCISCO JIMÉNEZ

MALAGA. Taxi drivers on the Costa del Sol are planning to up their game in the face of competition from companies such as Uber, which plans to operate more than 200 vehicles between Malaga and Marbella this summer, and Cabify, which already has about 100 in operation between Malaga and Seville. The local taxi sector has drawn up an action plan to ensure that it still attracts the greatest share of the market, starting with a single phone number for the Taxi Costa del Sol switchboard, which is the same no matter which municipality the client is calling from. By calling 952 17 00 17, people will be put through to the office in the area they need the service. The website www.taxicostadelSol.com also offers the possibility of calculating the fare, which varies according to point of origin because, unlike minicabs, the fares are regulated by local town halls.

The other improvement to the taxi service is an app which, like those used by Uber and Cabify, enables the user to contract a service via their mobile phone, knowing the approximate cost in advance. This new tool is not yet available, but should be in operation soon.

The taxi sector also hopes to sign agreements with public institutions and private organisations to be the official form of transport at events in the province, wants all taxis to carry credit card machines, (already obligatory in Malaga city), and is modernising the fleet with the introduction of more hybrid vehicles and large models adapted for wheelchairs.

"The arrival of these other companies is a problem, but the solution is to be better than them. Anyone coming here had better be prepared, because the taxi sector is getting stronger all the time," said Juan González, the spokesman for the Costa del Sol Taxi Confederation, this week.

Taxis in Malaga province are given high marks by tourists

:: F. JIMÉNEZ

MALAGA. The taxi service is highly valued by tourists in Malaga province, according to a survey carried out by the regional government. The 488 visitors who took part in the survey in the first three months of this year gave the taxi drivers an average score of 8.9 out of ten.

In Andalucía as a whole, the only taxi drivers to be given a higher mark were those in Cordoba, with 9.1, while the average for the region was 8.7.

The results of these surveys over the years have reflected considerable improvements in the taxi service. Less than a decade ago (2009), tourists marked it just 5.9 out of ten.

In the most recent survey, the visitors also indicated that they were impressed by transport facilities in general, giving the railway service a score of 8.9, the buses 8.6 and car hire 8.1 out of ten.

Government and Junta agree to coordinate Marbella train project

The Public Works minister did, however, reject a request to finish the corridor between Malaga and Seville, which was begun by the Junta

:: IGNACIO LILLO

MALAGA. The Minister of Public Works, Íñigo de la Serna, and his counterpart in the Junta de Andalucía, Felipe López, met in Madrid this week and agreed that the planned extension of the suburban railway service from Fuengirola to Marbella will be jointly coordinated between their two ministries. Until now, the regional government has not been involved in the project, which is key to the development of the Costa del Sol.

After the meeting, De la Serna said the alternative plans for the line which will run to Marbella and Estepona have already been presented, and he was confident that "in a few weeks," the results of a study into the project will be made available to the public.

Felipe López said he was very satisfied with the commitment from the Minister that the railway projects carried out by the government in Andalucía will be analysed at technical meetings, "as this will enable the Junta to know what action is being planned and therefore be able to contribute to improving it".

De la Serna also explained that Felipe López had asked the government to assume responsibility for the direct rail corridor between Malaga and Seville, which the Junta started but had to suspend because of lack of funds. The minister said this was not the government's responsibility, although the representative of the Junta said it is, because in 2013 the EU approved the Trans-European Network and this stretch of railway is included in that.

He also pointed out that the EU provides funds towards the execution of the project, so the work which has already been carried out by the Junta between Marchena y Antequera was a "start" to the infrastructure project which the government could finish in the future.

Architects declare war on bureaucratic problems

:: JESÚS HINOJOSA

MALAGA. Earlier this year developers and property professionals in Malaga expressed their concern over the length of time bureaucratic processes were taking, saying these were putting off investors. Now, the provincial architects' association has decided to take action, to make the authorities aware of the difficulties involved in even a simple procedure, such as obtaining town planning permission.

The association has set up a committee to defend the interests of the profession, and four working groups will be tackling the problems which have been faced by investors who want to carry out projects again, after the hardest years of the crisis. One of these groups is focusing on "delays and errors" which have already occurred, and it recently held a meeting with some of those affected, who were especially critical of the Town Planning department at Malaga city hall and the local branch of the regional government's ministry for Culture.

Among the complaints were the fact that it had taken 18 months to obtain a works licence, files had gone missing for months, nobody in the department knew who was dealing with an application or what stage it was at.

The association wants the procedures to be more transparent and the criteria to be unified, and says it is prepared to carry out some of the processes itself to speed things up.

Politicians look for solutions for town slums*VÉLEZ-MÁLAGA

EUGENIO CABEZAS. Councillors from Vélez-Málaga town hall met with representatives from the regional government, the Junta de Andalucía, on Monday to discuss the demolition of the Casillas de la Vía slum area to the west of Torre del Mar, where around 40 families live. The main objective of the meeting was to work out where to rehouse those residents as well as people from other deprived neighbourhoods in Vélez-Málaga. The Junta de Andalucía has promised 1.5 million euros to the town hall, but clarified during the meeting that the money must not be used to demolish the slums, but to rehome residents and help with associated social problems, which include drug use and school attendance. Councillor for Torre del Mar, Jesús Atencia, said, "Delaying the demolition is a public health risk."

Controversy over parking fines in residential areas*VÉLEZ-MÁLAGA

Mayor Antonio Ferrer, who lives in La Mata, said that he had not given orders to issue the fines. The incident is believed to be related to an ongoing dispute between the town hall and the local police force.

The donations will be given to people in both places who are facing economic difficulties. Anyone interested in helping should contact Inma on 673 611 157 or 665 022 937.

Torre del Mar walkway is first of many to connect Axarquía coast

The 30-metre bridge over the Güí river provides a continuous path from Torre del Mar to El Morche and more are planned from Torrox to Nerja

EUGENIO CABEZAS

TORROX. Local politicians including mayor of Torrox, Óscar Medina, along with Elías Bendodo, President of Málaga's provincial government; Diputación, officially opened a 30-metre coastal pathway over the Güí river, connecting Torre del Mar and El Morche via a continuous 10-kilometre coastal pathway.

This is the first in a series of similar works planned for 2018. Diputación says that 31 of the 47 kilometres of coastline in the Axarquía will be accessible by foot and bicycle by the end of this year. Currently 25 kilometres are accessible.

The 200,000-euro Güí river project was funded by Diputación, which has earmarked a further 700,000 euros for work to the Axarquía's coastline this year.

Other planned projects include a 45-metre wooden walkway over the Manzano stream in Torrox and a four-kilometre stretch will connect Torrox with neighbouring Nerja.

Rincón plans a footbridge at end of promenade

EUGENIO CABEZAS

RINCÓN DE LA VICTORIA. Rincón de la Victoria has also announced progress this week in its stretch of the Senda Litoral coastal pathway project. Although the area already has its own seven-kilometre-long promenade, the town council plans to construct a footbridge over the Granadillas river, at the point where the promenade ends in Torre de Benagalbón. The mayor, Francisco Salado (PP), accompanied by Elena Aguilar, a spokesperson for Ciudadanos, and president of the provincial government Elías Bendodo, visited the site to announce the project. Their aim is to build a 30-metre-long, three-metre-wide wooden footbridge which would serve both pedestrians and cyclists. The design will be similar to that of the bridge over the Güí river between Torrox and Vélez-Málaga.

Officials predict the cost of the project to be around 100,000 euros, pending authorisation from the Andalusian government.

The intention is to put the contract out to tender after summer, with a view to finish construction at the end of the year.

The search is on for the best espeto in Vélez-Málaga

The month-long event is the first of its kind according to the deputy mayor and will be taking place in beach restaurants in the area

EUROPA PRESS

VÉLEZ-MÁLAGA. Restaurants along the beaches of Torre del Mar and Benajárfé will be participating in a month-long sardine competition from Monday.

The event, which will run until 22 June, will allow visitors to sample the typical dish of skewered sardines cooked on an open fire and vote for the restaurant they think serves up the tastiest version.

The 'espeto route' (Ruta Gastronómica Playa 5 Espetos) is "the first of its kind" according to the deputy mayor for Torre del Mar, Jesús Pérez Atencia, who will be at the opening on Monday.

All of the participating restaurants have been awarded the 'Q for Quality' award, which, according to Atencia, means that visitors are "guaranteed to get the best quality service" the area offers.

Visitors will be able to pick up 'passports' from participating restaurants in order to rate the espetos. There will be a prize for the winning restaurant at the end of the competition.

Prison for man accused of La Viñuela murder for previous crime

EUROPA PRESS

MÁLAGA. A court in Málaga has given the man accused of murdering his partner in La Viñuela in February a six-month prison sentence for causing grievous bodily harm to a previous girlfriend.

The incident for which the sentence was given occurred in Málaga city centre in May 2016, when the man hit his then partner twice in the face causing injuries which led to her spending five days in hospital. As well as the prison sentence the man, who has been in custody awaiting the trial of the La Viñuela murder since February, was also issued with a restraining order meaning that he cannot have any kind of contact with the victim of the 2016 incident.

In February the man was tracked down in Marbella after the body of 44-year-old María Adela Fortes was found at her home in the village of La Viñuela in the Axarquía. They had met on the internet a few months before and had started a relationship.

The man had already served a nine-month prison sentence in 2012 for physically abusing his then wife and has allegedly been reported for domestic violence by a number of partners.

Should you be worried about a Brexit 'cliff-edge' for your money?

By Chris McCann, Partner, Blevins Franks

Attention has recently focused on a potential aspect of a post-Brexit world – whether expatriate Britons receiving private pensions or insurance payments from the UK will lose access to their money.

As things currently stand, many UK businesses who conduct financial transactions in the EU or European Economic Area (EEA) are set to lose the legal right to continue cross-border trading after Brexit. However, this is only the case if nothing were to change between now and the date the UK actually leaves the bloc. The reality is that this is one of the crucial issues being addressed in Brexit negotiations.

With citizens and businesses potentially affected on both sides, it is of mutual benefit to agree a solution in time.

Framing the current situation

Today, UK businesses that provide financial services to Britons living in EU countries are able to do so under the EU's free movement of capital rules as members of the bloc. After Brexit, unless similar arrangements are in place, they are set to lose the right to operate within the EU.

For expatriates with UK personal pensions and insurance contracts this means they may no longer be able to receive payments in the EU post-Brexit (the UK State Pension is not affected). Providers would face the dilemma of choosing between breaching contract law (by failing to honour their contracts with members) or breaking European law.

Shared interest in securing a solution

The problem runs both ways – also affecting EU nationals in the UK receiving payments from EU companies. UK chancellor, Philip Hammond, acknowledged it is in the interest of all parties to protect their citizens and businesses by avoiding a cliff-edge. He confirmed work was already underway to put "comprehensive plans in place for the full range of possible outcomes" that would "avoid unnecessary costs and disruption on individuals and businesses as the UK leaves the EU."

So far, the UK has offered to extend existing arrangements for EU companies operating in the UK throughout the transition period (up to 31 December 2020). While the EU has not yet reciprocated, Brexit negotiations are ongoing and much depends on what is agreed. For example, in the event of a 'softer' Brexit, there may be little disruption here. If the UK remains in the customs union (or similar arrangement to the EEA), maintaining cross-border access for UK businesses would be relatively straightforward.

However, it is important to remember that overseas access to UK payments is not exclusive to being within a trading bloc like the EU. Many British expatriates living abroad, such as those retired in Australia and Canada, are able to legally receive their UK pension today without any problems.

Can you do anything to protect your benefits?

While there is little cause for expatriates affected by this issue to panic, there may be action you can take to ensure you maintain uninterrupted access to UK-based private pension and insurance payments.

Depending on your situation, you may be able to transfer your benefits into a structure that is already compliant in Spain. By transferring UK pensions into an EU/EEA-based Qualifying Recognised Overseas Pension Scheme (QROPS), for example, you could unlock additional benefits, such as tax efficiency and currency flexibility. Moving your money to a QROPS or similar structure would also shelter it from future UK taxation (including lifetime allowance penalties) and offer more choice in who will inherit your pension benefits.

Even if the potential 'cliff-edge' issue does not affect you, it is a good idea to review how your pensions, investments and assets are structured. The key reasons for this are three-fold in the face of Brexit. First, you need to make sure your financial planning suits your particular situation, including your income requirements, appetite for risk and estate planning objectives. Second, your wealth and assets should be as held as tax efficiently as possible for your life in Spain. Third, you should ensure you take advantage of available opportunities while you can, as it is likely that some rules may change after Brexit, especially around taxation of UK pensions.

For the best results, explore your options with a locally-based, FCA-regulated financial adviser with cross-border experience who can establish the most suitable approach for your personal situation and objectives. Act sooner rather than later to make sure you secure the best outcome for you and your family, regardless of Brexit.

Mijas books to end up in custody

The town hall will turn the old Guardia Civil headquarters into a public library

MIJAS

Neighbourhood organisations and parents' associations collected almost 500 signatures to demand that the facility be put into use

IVÁN GELIBTER

The books of Mijas have found a new place to lock themselves away, so to speak. A new project from the local government hopes to establish a new public library in a building which was part of the former Guardia Civil headquarters in Mijas Pueblo.

This initiative is promoted by the library department, after a recent campaign from neighbours and local organisations collected close to 500 signatures for their petition, which asks that certain facilities be renovated in accordance with the needs of the public.

Town councillor Hipólito Zapico explained, "We have carried out a study which evaluates the needs of our libraries. As well as new materials, the study also considered the sort of spaces that current library users would find most preferable." One of the most frequent demands was that the current library in Mijas Pueblo be reconstructed or moved to a different location.

The launch of the project last month was attended by representatives of residents' organisations and parents' associations, as well as Rosa María Badillo, coordinator of the Arco Iris de Madres Narradoras project, a local association that encourages reading among young children.

"It will be marvellous to be able to provide an area for cultural projects in Mijas. This important new space will cater to all ages. It will help to modernise the library system and assist in the creation of cultural content," said Badillo.

The ideal location

The town council is keen to highlight one specific element of the project: The creation of a multi-use room with over 30 work places.

"This space, or the reading room, can be divided and used for various meetings and activities at the same time, making use of the space to its maximum potential without disturbing others in the study area," explained Zapico.

At the same time, the councillor pointed out the good location of the building, which is just a few metres from the Town Hall, the San Sebastián school, the health centre and the municipal archive building.

Air conditioning, lighting, security, accessibility and acoustics will all be considered carefully during the planning of the facility.

The government team in charge of the facility prefer to remain "cautious" while discussing the timeline for building work. The project is out to tender, with a projected cost of 11,500.

"The process takes time, so we plan to keep residents informed over the next few months, to that they are aware of any developments," said the councillor.

Seabourn Ovation calls in at Malaga and Gibraltar for the first time

The passenger cruise ship has recently completed its maiden voyage and will now visit ports in the UK, Mediterranean and Northern Europe before moving on to the Baltic

SUR

MALAGA / GIBRALTAR. The 40,350 tonne, 604-passenger cruise ship, Seabourn Ovation, made its inaugural trips to both Malaga and Gibraltar last week.

In Malaga, more than 3,000 passengers visited the port area in one day as the Seabourn's arrival coincided with that of two other cruise ships.

Both places celebrated the ship's arrival with a reception on board with the captain.

Representatives from the Gibraltar Tourist Board, the Port Authority and local shipping agents MH Bland were in attendance at the British overseas territory, while Malaga city hall's department for tourism, port authority Cruceros Málaga and the business Cabeza Marítima joined the ceremony in the city of Malaga.

The ship, whose sister Seabourn Encore visited the province in August 2017, belongs to the Seabourn Cruise Line (part of the Carnival group).

It is classed as a luxury vessel and all passenger cabins have their own verandah.

British singer and actress Elaine Page launched the ship on 11 May in Valetta, Malta. It will visit the UK, Mediterranean and Northern Europe before eventually going on to the Baltic.

Calls from unions and patients for improvements at Benalmádena's local hospital

BENALMÁDENNA

ALBERTO GÓMEZ. Patients, staff and trade unions are continuing to demand that Benalmádena's local hospital be "fully opened". They say that X-ray facilities and a children's unit are urgently needed as users have to make a 30-kilometre round trip in order to use the nearest hospital with these services.

According to nursing union, Satse, some 30 per cent of the building is still unoccupied and other services such as urology, eye care and dermatology are lacking.

The Costa del Sol Hospital in Marbella, which is responsible for the Benalmádena facility as well, says that it is working efficiently and offering the services that it was created for.

The notorious La Cala motorway blackspot - 36 serious accidents on the bend in 7 years

The lowering of the speed limit and installation of radar cameras on the A-7 have done little to reduce the risk, especially for lorries, and tailback misery is set to continue

IVÁN GELIBTER

MIJAS. Local residents are well-used to their journey along the A-7 coastal motorway from Marbella and Fuengirola being disrupted by an accident between kilometres 200 and 202 at La Cala de Mijas. This week a local politician highlighted just how dangerous that stretch is.

Socialist MP, Miguel Ángel Heredia, said that the number of serious accidents at that point on the busy road in the last seven years has reached 36. Apart from injuries and fatalities, the frequent pile-ups cause many kilometres of tailbacks, especially in summer.

The blackspot is centred on the bend by Mijas Playa which turns almost 90 degrees and which is a real challenge for inexperienced drivers and those in long vehicles. The most dangerous stretch is just 700 metres between kilometre 200 and 202 and mostly affects traffic driving towards Fuengirola.

In recent years efforts have been made to reduce the accident rate here. The maximum speed limit was reduced from 100km/h to 80km/h and also an average speed radar put in along a 5 kilometre section of the road, including the La Cala bend. This has reduced the number of accidents involving cars but not lorries.

When asked, locals say the only solution would be to actually straighten the road, something which is unlikely as the road hugs the beach here and, in any case, no proposal has ever been put forward.

The Socialist group on Mijas council has said it will continue to put pressure on central government to solve the problem and local politicians of all parties want to see the AP-7 toll road available free of charge when traffic builds up. So far Madrid has not commented.

Strike by judges and prosecutors affects over 500 city court cases

The key court workers want the government to invest more in the justice system and take politics out of judicial oversight

:: ÁLVARO FRÍAS / JUAN CANO

MALAGA. After various part-stop-pages over the last few weeks, judges and public prosecutors working in courts across Malaga province took part in a national strike on Tuesday. They are asking the government for more resources and more independence.

In Malaga city's large central court complex, more than 90 per cent of the 200 judges and prosecutors stayed away, causing more than 500 cases that were due to be heard in the building to be postponed. This is only the second strike ever recorded among these key court workers, the last one being in 2009. Judges' representative in Malaga, José María Páez, said that a minimum service level had been maintained for urgent cases.

Explaining the causes of the nationwide strike, Páez said that there had been underinvestment in courts and the justice service was "the poor relation" of other public services. He added that judges and prosecutors want to see the "depoliticisation" of the national body that oversees the appointment of top judges and inspection of courts.

Judges, who carry out detailed investigations of offences in Spain as well as hearing cases, say they are 30 short in Malaga city alone, and public prosecutors say they are 15 short across the province.

Local lawyers have criticised the strike action, with provincial representative, Francisco Javier Lara, saying that "we might agree with their complaints but not with them going on strike".

The national Justice ministry says it has been working hard "for months" on an agreement to end the dispute.

HOSPITALITY WORKERS' COSTA MARCH

Some 85,000 employees in hotel and catering in Malaga province could be called out on strike if ongoing collective bargaining between unions and industry bosses fails. The old agreement expired last December. Hoteliers want unions to agree to more flexible days off and smaller salary increases. This week around 500 workers have carried out a four-stage protest march along the Costa del Sol. The above photo shows the marchers on Marbella's Golden Mile.

Walkathon raises 29,000 for Cudeca

The annual fun-walk helps the charity to continue offering palliative care

BY TONY BRYANT

BENALMÁDENA. Around 1,600 people participated in the 16th edition of the Cudeca Walkathon last Sunday in Benalmádena Costa.

The charity hike is one of the organisation's biggest annual events and this year it raised more than 29,000 euros.

The walkers, some of whom were accompanied by their dogs, could either choose the full ten kilometre route, or the slightly less demanding routes of five and two kilometres. The event was attended by Mayor of Benalmádena, Víctor Navas, and Cudeca officials, Rafael Olalla and Marisa Martín.

Marisa Martín said she was "extremely happy" to see so many people participating in the walk again, while also acknowledging the "tireless work" of the 100 volunteers who made the event possible.

Popular Costa del Sol entertainer, Mel Williams got the walkers on their way with a fitting rendition of You'll Never Walk Alone, an act he has performed since the fundraising walk first began.

The route took the walkers along the promenade behind Sunset Beach Club to the Playa Bonita Hotel. From here, they headed towards to port in Benalmádena Costa and then back to the finishing line at Sunset Beach Club.

The first walkers began to appear at the finish line around 1.30pm, but most were in no hurry as it was a wonderful day to be walking along the seafont.

Sharon, accompanied by her husband, Kevin, and daughter, Elena, was participating in the event for the twelfth year running. The family, who own a bar in Arroyo de la Miel, raised almost 600 euros in sponsorship.

"We like to support Cudeca because they do such a wonderful job. You never know if you might need their services one day, so occasions like these give everyone an opportunity to help," Sharon told SUR in English.

Jackie and Ronnie had travelled from Álora - where they have lived for 15 years - to take part in the walk. It was the first time they had participated and they were determined to enjoy the event, even though their reasons for joining in were very personal.

"I decided to do the walk because I lost my dad and some lovely friends to cancer, so it is something that is very close to my heart," Jackie said.

Entertainment and prizes

Once the Walkathon was over, the participants enjoyed an afternoon of live entertainment and refreshments. There was a prize raffle that offered hotel breaks, tickets for museums and attractions, and dinner in some of the coast's top establishments. There were also prizes for the individual and group that raised the most in sponsorship.

Nine year old Jago Bux came first in the children's category for the second year running, winning four free tickets to Selwo Marina.

Third prize in the adult section - a two-night stay in Ireland - was won by Cudeca volunteer, Hazel Bradshaw, and her dog, Oscar.

"Oscar and I have been doing the Walkathon for many years. I think Oscar was the first dog to be sponsored in the event," Hazel explained.

The second prize of a medical check-up at the Vithas Hospital was won by Chris Knapp, also a Cudeca volunteer.

The first prize of a six-night holiday in Portugal was won by the Gotlieb Hair and Beauty Salon in Fuen-girola, who raised 3,671 euros in sponsorship. The staff have participated in the Walkathon for the past 12 years, and even though this is not the most they have ever raised, it was the eleventh time they had triumphed.

Operation beach clean

Plastic waste is being removed from the Costa del Sol's beaches each month by a team of volunteers

ASH BOLTON

MARBELLA. Scores of volunteers helped remove plastic waste from a Costa del Sol beach last Saturday.

The event saw a mixed group of nationalities spend hours picking up everything from ice cream wrappers and plastic bottles, to plastic bags and general rubbish.

Organised by Marbella-based expat Craig Webb, the group descended on Los Boliches in Fuengirola for their latest monthly event.

The fourth beach clean-up saw around 25 volunteers from the group Plastic Free Seas Worldwide don gloves for the beach clean.

Craig, 38, an investment manager who lives in Marbella, told SUR in English that he started picking up plastic on his own while at the beach a few months ago.

"A couple of people started joining me and then it just went from there really," he said.

"So I started organising monthly events and we've had up to 50 people at a time helping out. The last event in May saw us remove 81 kg of plastic from a local beach.

"I got the idea from David Attenborough as I'm a huge fan of his. I watched a documentary where he exclaimed the concerns with plastic in the seas; it made me want to help educate others and do good.

The dangerous Portuguese man o' war, an increasingly common sight in the Mediterranean

EFE

MALAGA. Specimens of the Portuguese man o' war, a violet bag which floats in the sea with tentacles, were sighted off the coast of Malaga last weekend. Although they are common in the warmer parts of the Atlantic, they are increasingly sighted on the Costa. Fátima Hernández, a marine biologist, explained that the animal, physalia physalis, is not a jellyfish but a siphonophore which is likely to disappear from the coast before the arrival of summer. They are very poisonous if touched.

A Portuguese man o' war spotted recently on the Costa.

ALAN CAMBELL

"You feel like you really make a difference."

Craig said bags and high visibility vests are supplied by organisers, and that all people wishing to take part need to do is bring a pair of gloves.

He explained: "We only had 25 people join us on our last clean-up, which was due to people having plans to watch the royal wedding."

"Los Boliches was very clean so we won't be going back there again. Generally the Blue Flag beaches are very clean. So it's nothing against the cleaners. We tend to focus on where the machines can't reach, such as in between the rocks."

"We organise one event a month to keep interest going. People bring their children and their dogs, and it's turned out to be quite a social event and a great way to meet people."

The dad of two, who is originally from Bournemouth in the UK and moved to Marbella permanently three years ago, added that the group is growing and now boasts a newsletter, Facebook group, t-shirts and their own eco-bags.

The next beach clean is on 16 June at Doña Lola in Calahonda and starts at 9am.

Rafael Amargo reaches his peak to raise awareness for charity

Rafael Amargo danced on top of La Concha mountain last Thursday in support of Debra-Piel de Mariposa

■ SUR IN ENGLISH

MARBELLA. Rafael Amargo, a dancer and choreographer from Granada, danced on top of La Concha, the most famous peak in the Sierra de Marbella on Thursday last week. His aim was to raise awareness for butterfly skin or Epidermolysis bullosa (EB), a rare condition that between 3,200 and 5,000 people in Spain suffer from. The spectacle was filmed by drones and shared on social media in order to raise awareness for the chronic condition which leads to very fragile skin.

The well-known dancer was accompanied by members of the Marbella fire department, great supporters of the butterfly skin charity, as well as members of the IPA police association.

Amargo danced on top of the bench that the local firefighters had carried up to the top of La Concha two years ago, another initiative to help Debra.

awareness for the association, whose mission is to improve the quality of life of those affected by the condition in Spain.

Now, thanks to Rafael Amargo, they hope to strengthen their resolve and continue defending the rights of people with butterfly skin within the framework of the public health and social system.

"Artists must respect associations, which, like Debra, do so much for people who suffer from certain illnesses," Amargo said. The mayor of Marbella, Ángeles Muñoz, praised the selfless act, saying: "Rafael, you don't know how important your contribution is for us and for the charity."

Marbella wants to build better links with foreign residents

■ GABRIELA BERNER

MARBELLA. A need for greater contact with the 40,000 foreigners of 130 nationalities living in Marbella was behind the meeting organised on Thursday last week by the town hall. Not all information on rights and obligations, public affairs and events reaches residents, explained Oti García, who will now officially manage Marbella's foreigners office. This first meeting with representatives of more than 30 foreign associations took place at the new space for foreign residents in the Palacio de Congresos, where a training area, international library and offices are under construction. Mayor Ángeles Muñoz stressed that the town wants to establish closer and more direct links with its foreign residents and to show more presence at the events organised by foreigners. An international office will soon be set up in Las Chapas, said councillor Carlos Alcalá, and his colleague in Nueva Andalucía, Cristóbal Garre, stated that the door to his office was always open to foreign citizens. The representatives repeatedly pointed out the importance of registering on the municipal census (padrón). The more inhabitants a town has, the higher its financial resources from central government.

MADRID. In the past few days, most people will have been receiving personal or professional emails to inform them that a database is being updated. This is because Friday 25 May is the date the new General Data Protection Regulation comes into force to comply with EU rules. It applies to small firms who keep details of their clients as well as large ones and it coincides with the scandal over the way Facebook has used people's data. That is a perfect example to explain why the new law is needed, says the European Commissioner for Justice and Consumers, Vera Jourova.

What is the GDPR? In Spain it is known as the Reglamento General de Protección de Datos (RGPD); it is a new European regulation for the protection of personal data. It is the first time this has existed at a European level; until now, every country has had its own legislation. The GDPR unifies the criteria regarding what is considered personal data and how it should be protected. It took several years to draw up the regulation and it was approved on 25 May 2016, but they gave us two years so that companies could adapt to the new legal framework.

Who does it affect? Every company that keeps, processes, works with and holds data of a personal nature of any citizen of the European Union, no matter which country it operates in. In other words, even if a company is based in the USA and has no physical presence in Europe but offers its products and services here, it has to comply with these regulations.

Penalties. Companies which do not comply with this law will face fines and penalties. There is a wide range of these, and it is one of the most controversial points in the text. The highest fines could be 20 million euros or four per cent of the company's worldwide turnover (whichever is greatest).

Citizens. The new regulation gives citizens more rights. They can ask for incorrect, inexact or incomplete information to be corrected, or removed when no longer necessary or if the processing is illegal (the 'right to be forgotten'); they can object to their personal data being processed for marketing purposes or for reasons related with their own private situation, or ask for the processing of their personal data to be restricted in certain circumstances. EU citizens can also receive their data in a machine-readable format so they can send it to someone else who is responsible for data processing ('portability of data'). Also, they can now ask that decisions based on automated processing be taken by actual people, and they also have the right to express their point of view and reject the said decision.

More clarity. The new regulation also obliges companies to give information more clearly and simply about the way they use and process personal data, especially when the information is addressed to minors. This is a way of trying to put an end to lengthy conditions of use in very legal language when referring to the processing of information.

Explicit consent. One of the most important changes in the regulation is that consent has to be freely given, informed, specific and unequivocal so that companies have authorisation to hold and process the data. Consent cannot be assumed from silence or inaction by the citizens. When the companies request authorisation to process this information, they have to specify what they will be using the personal data for and provide contact details of the company which processes it. The consent has to be freely given and be a specific, informed and unequivocal statement.

This informed consent has to include, as a minimum, the following information: the identity of the organisation which processes the data, the purposes, the type of data and the possibility of withdrawing consent. If the consent is related to an international transfer of data, the citizen must be made aware of the possible risks of transferring it to countries outside the EU, in the case where there has been no relevant de-

Notification within three days

A company is also obliged to notify the authorities if it has been hacked or suffered a breach of security which has exposed the personal details it holds on citizens of the European Union. The GDPR demands that those responsible for data processing in a company, in the case of an incident such as identity theft or violation of personal data security, notify the Data Protection Agency within 72 hours. If they do so after that period has expired, they will need to explain the reasons for the delay.

cision by the Commission or they do not provide suitable guarantees.

Personal data. One of the most important points of the new regulation is its definition of personal data. It is defined as any information relating to an identified or identifiable physical person. The different pieces of information, which when collated could reveal an individual's identity, are also considered personal data. Personal details which have been made anonymous (in other words they cannot be directly associated with anybody), coded or presented under a pseudonym, but which can be used to identify someone, are still personal data and included in the sphere of application of the GDPR.

On the other hand, personal details which have been made anonymous, so that the person cannot be identified or is no longer identified, will no longer be considered personal data. For the data to be considered truly anonymous, the anonymity has to be irreversible.

Also, the European Commission makes it clear what personal data is considered to be and what parts it consists of: name and surnames, address, email address (the type which says name.surname@company.com, not info@company.com), national identity number, location details (such as the location function data on a mobile phone), Internet IP address, the identifier of a 'cookie' or the data held by a hospital.

ADVERTORIAL Navasol

Rental properties wanted

Navasol, a family-run real estate agency and property management business based in Benalmádena and currently celebrating its 20th anniversary, would like to announce a unique opportunity to get your property on TV!

Founded in 1998, Navasol is run by Mike, Sharon, Ana May and Arturo Navas. They are ably assisted by a team of cleaners, maintenance people and builders who provide a broad and flexible range of services tailored to owners' specific needs, as well as a legal team who provide advice and take care of the fine print.

All in all, Navasol provides a reliable, personal service no matter what clients require. The experienced team takes the worry out of buying or selling property in Spain, handles all details and guides buyers through the process from start to finish and beyond. Their services even include 24-hour emergency phone assistance for complete peace of mind.

All of the above led to Navasol being chosen from more than 50 rental agencies in Benalmádena to be featured on the BBC's hugely successful 'Getaway For Winter' holiday program. The response was such that the company's website collapsed temporarily due to excess traffic, and resulted in more than 100 new enquiries, the majority of which led to bookings.

With the BBC now discussing a follow-up program, Navasol is eager to add short and long term rental properties to their books in preparation for another surge in enquiries. Owners in the area who would be interested in renting, particularly during the winter months, are encouraged to contact Navasol now so as not to miss out on a chance for their property to be featured on TV.

"Users need to know which companies have their details"

The Consumers Union of Andalucía (UCE) believes that the new EU regulation will have taken many business owners by surprise. The president, Jesús Burgos, points out that they were given two years after the regulation was approved on 25 May 2016, to put it into effect, but he says nobody did anything about.

However, he is relieved that the new law has come into force because "users need to know which companies have their details". Burgos warns that as the companies have not left themselves enough time to adapt to the new law, "they will continue to move people's data without their consent," so he hopes the authorities will take note and fine those that do so. "The good thing is that users will now be able to cancel their data at any time," he says. / JUAN SOTO

The parents of Lucía Vivar, the three-year-old who was found dead by train tracks, ask that police don't shelve her case

:: AGUSTÍN PELÁEZ

MÁLAGA. More than 5,000 protesters gathered in Málaga's Plaza de la

Constitución on 19 May to demand that authorities open new lines of investigation into the death of Lucía Vivar.

The three-year-old disappeared in Pizarra on 27 July 2017, and was found dead, more than four kilometres away, next to the tracks of the C2 Cercanías line between Málaga and Álora. Lucía's parents, Almudena Hidalgo and Antonio Vivar, maintain that the child could not have walked that far alone and unseen.

The protest takes place after the Málaga courts have announced the possibility of the case being provisionally shelved after a lack of potential lines of inquiry.

Almudena and Antonio insist that the authorities "open their eyes" and explore the case further, calling the original investigation a "botched job".

End of the Invaders - mosaic artworks are removed from city's historic buildings

Malaga city council was ordered to have the controversial pieces taken down, but as yet has not done so from the sites it owns itself

■ ANTONIO JAVIER LÓPEZ

MALAGA. A year ago the centre of Malaga was subjected to an invasion of colourful mosaic artworks. In total 29 pieces, shaped like icons from a Space Invaders game, appeared on the side of city buildings.

Now they are being taken down by the owners, none of whom asked for them in the first place but some of whom have grown attached to their colourful presence.

The scandal caused by their installation lies in the fact that half of them were put up on listed buildings. The works were by the French artist known only as Invader, who is suspected of organising the original installation, in conjunction with the city's CAC contemporary art centre, as a promotion ahead of a planned exhibition.

Recently the enigmatic Invader, if he or she can be identified and found, and the director of the town-hall-funded CAC, Fernando Francés, were told they would be facing a formal judicial investigation.

Meanwhile the Junta de Andalucía regional government, which is responsible for controlling listed buildings, ordered Malaga council to remove the artworks, saying that, as the town hall pays for the CAC, it is its job to have them removed. The council in turn wrote to the buildings' owners giving them two weeks to take them down, although helpfully offering to have council employees do it at a cost of 2,700 euros each. As a result building owners have been picking the mosaic pieces off themselves.

A mosaic comes down on the corner of Plaza Merced in Malaga's historic centre. ■ PACO VILLALOBOS

Ironically the council hasn't taken down the couple on its own buildings yet, saying it is waiting for funds to be approved and that it hopes to remove and preserve them intact.

Some of the colourful works have yet to be removed. ■ F. GONZÁLEZ

Malaga set for large procession of famous Holy Week images of the Virgin Mary

■ SUR

MALAGA. The centre of Malaga is getting ready for a special, non-seasonal outing of many of the huge floats carrying the religious images of the Virgin Mary, normally only seen in the street at Easter.

This Saturday (26 May) the city will be celebrating the 150th anniversary of the proclamation of the image of Santa María de la Victoria (Saint Mary of the Victory) as patron saint as well as the 75th anniversary of papal approval to crown the image.

To mark the occasion all the images of Our Lady that have been granted 'crowned' status, ten in total, will be carried in the afternoon and evening on their floats.

The brotherhoods will take them out of their respective "homes" around the city at set times between 4pm and 7.30pm and they will follow a route including Calle Larios, passing the west front of the Cathedral from around 9pm to midnight.

The celebrations, which will go on late into the night, provide a unique opportunity for visitors to see some of Malaga's traditional Holy Week ritual out of season.

Antonio Banderas begins his theatre project with adjoining premises and El Pimpi's help

■ JUAN SOTO

MALAGA. Malaga-born Hollywood actor, Antonio Banderas, has taken the first steps towards converting the city's Alameda Theatre into his new Soho Theatre project with the acquisition of a shop unit next door.

The former clothing store is expected to be turned into a restaurant, linked to the renamed theatre, which will be managed by well-known bodega bar, El Pimpi, of which Banderas is part owner.

The 1960s theatre building, currently called Teatro Alameda, will close at the end of May and is expected to reopen at the end of September next year after two-million-euro renovations.

Banderas has said that his aim is for Malaga to become a benchmark for international and national theatre and for tourists to visit not just for the museums but for the city's offer of stage performances. For the opening, the theatre is expected to welcome the musical Zorba the Greek before it moves on to London and Broadway.

Gürtel corruption trial verdict brings huge sentences and more woe for PP

The ruling conservative party will have to pay back 245,000 euros in fraudulent campaign money as judges call into question PM's credibility

■ SUR

MADRID. Of the many cases of political corruption in Spanish courts at the moment, the Caso Gürtel was probably the highest profile. After ten years of investigation and deliberation the damning verdict on the case, which has cast a long shadow over the government's Partido Popular (PP) party, was finally released on Thursday in a 1,700 page court document.

In the verdict, 29 of the 37 who had been on trial (a mixture of business people, PP politicians, intermediaries and spouses), were sentenced to a total of 351 years in jail and heavy fines. Significantly the court found it proven that the PP party had been illegally financed by corrupt funds and said that the prime minister's account when he appeared as a witness during the trial lacked credibility. The party will have to pay back 245,000 euros.

The case centred on Francisco Correa who through his companies charged PP administrations inflated fees for services, paying back large amounts in commission to politicians. Correa was given 51 years. The case itself has spurred other corruption cases that are still ongoing.

Ex-PP grandee held over fraud in what the party says is just another 'isolated incident'

■ SUR

VALENCIA. The ruling PP party was embroiled in a fresh corruption and fraud scandal this week with the arrest of a former cabinet minister who was also once president of the Valencia regional government and mayor of Benidorm.

Eduardo Zaplana, 62, was arrested as part of a money laundering and bribery operation linked to his time at the helm of the Valencia government. Investigators believe that he was paid money for the awarding of public contracts, including the privatisation of the regional ITV vehicle testing service in 1997. Several other people were also held.

When news of the arrests broke on Tuesday, few within politics seemed surprised and the current PP leadership was quick to distance itself saying it was "an isolated case" that belonged to the party's past. Reports said that Zaplana had been under suspicion for years and some 10 million euros is involved.

Other parties further criticised the PP for the amount of scandals with current and former members. PSOE leader, Pedro Sánchez said this was just "another example".

Madrid refuses to ratify new Catalan regional ministers

■ SUR

BARCELONA / MADRID. Following the investiture of Quim Torra as new president of Catalonia last week, the national government has so far refused to hand back the devolved powers it had suspended. It had been expected that, once a new president was sworn in, Madrid would end the elements of direct rule.

However Prime Minister Mariano Rajoy has said that Quim Torra's choice of several regional ministers who are in jail or self-exiled outside Spain is not credible and has refused to ratify the Catalan leader's choice by publishing details in the official state bulletin. Torra, who visited Catalan leaders in jail this week in Madrid, has said he will take legal action.

MADRID. The leader and number two of anti-system Podemos have asked members to vote on whether they should stay at the helm of the political party. Pablo Iglesias and Irene Montero, who are a couple, want party activists to have the final say on whether they have done the right thing buying a luxury home outside Madrid for over 600,000 euros.

The pair, who are expecting twins, have been criticised on all sides for seemingly abandoning their principles of living like the humbler citizens they seek to represent. In a bid to overcome their complaints, they have put their political futures on the line with the vote which began online on Tuesday and finishes on Sunday. They have said they will also go if the turnout is low.

Chief minister of Gibraltar pays first official visit to La Línea, with Brexit on the agenda

The discussions between Fabian Picardo and Juan Franco also included fishing and collaboration in the fields of culture and sport

DEBBIE BARTLETT / EFE

GIBRALTAR. Chief minister Fabian Picardo paid his first official visit to La Línea on Thursday morning, for discussions with the mayor of the Spanish town, Juan Franco. Picardo, who was accompanied by Gibraltar's deputy chief minister Dr Joseph Garcia, also signed the town's 'Book of Honour' before joining the mayor and members of La Línea council for lunch.

During the visit Picardo called for a special fiscal regime for La Línea, above all to enable the town to host the online gaming firms that could abandon the Rock after Brexit.

This was not the first time the two men had met. Juan Franco has visited the chief minister in Gibraltar in the past and has spoken about the cordial relationship between them, but it was the first time Picardo had been invited to La Línea town hall.

Fabian Picardo and Juan Franco, among others, in La Línea. :: EFE

At their meeting, they discussed the situation on both sides of the border regarding Britain's withdrawal from the EU, which is a matter of especial concern to the Campo de Gibraltar region, problems associated with fishing and collaboration between Gibraltar and La Línea in the fields of culture and sport.

Background

It is well-known that there are differences and sometimes tension between Spain and the UK over Gibraltar. Spain, which ceded Gibraltar to Britain in perpetuity in 1713 under the Treaty of Utrecht, has made no secret of its wish to regain the British Overseas Territory. The Gibraltarians, however, voted overwhelmingly to remain British in two referendums, and there is a double lock sovereignty commitment by the UK, under which it will not enter into arrangements under which the people of Gibraltar would pass under the sovereignty of another State against their wishes, nor will Britain enter into a process of sovereignty negotiations with which Gibraltar is not content. Some feel that Spain is using Brexit as a lever to further its claim over Gibraltar, with demands such as joint control of, and the presence of Spanish police at, the airport.

That tension, though, is rarely sensed on the ground in the Campo de Gibraltar, the region of Spain closest to the Rock. Gibraltar, as a whole, is the second largest employer for Andalucía, after the regional government, and thousands of Spanish from the area cross the border to work. Brexit therefore poses potential problems with regard to the border, which needs to be free-flowing, and it could also have a hugely negative impact for the local Spanish economy.

The Financial Conduct Authority (FCA), the UK regulator, is finally throwing a lifeline to investors over unfair costs being charged for different classes of shares in the same fund. Investment managers and intermediaries will no longer be able to recommend or move investors into the most expensive shares classes. They will be obligated to move investors into the cheapest shares classes as long as it is in their best interests. When would it not be? For clients 'trapped' in expensive share classes it will mean a way out and reduction in costs.

The only aspect of an investment that we can absolutely guarantee is the cost. Costs matter and over time will produce a significant drag on the return on capital

THE BIGGER PICTURE JEREMY BLATCH

BETTER LATE THAN NEVER

Mutual Fund managers have for too long been issuing a bewildering number of different share classes for a given fund each with a different charging structure. The higher the cost to the investor the greater the commission for the intermediary or gain for the producer. This practice called 'box profits' has now been ended.

Previous rules that came in 2013 left investors who had invested prior to that date 'trapped in legacy classes' with high costs. The financial watchdog has said that advisors and fund managers will no longer have to seek individual consent before moving investors to clean or commission-free share classes. In other words investors will automatically be switched at 60 days notice. Allowing investors access to cheaper shares of the same fund is the regulator's way of ensuring firms deliver a proper duty of fiduciary care. Which in the 'old days' we used to call trust.

A recent independent report published by the FCA showed that the way in which fees were disclosed is as important a consideration for investors as the information on the fund itself. This however presupposes that investors are aware of the share classes that are available for a given fund and the differences between them. Research also showed that investors chose lower cost funds when the information was presented clearly enough so that they could understand the difference. Creative marketing has for years left all but the most diligent investors struggling to fully understand the total costs of a given investment.

This regulation will go some way to put pressure on managers to deliver a cost benefit for investors but will do little to rebalance the 'conflict of interests' between the interests of the shareholders of an investment management company and the investors in the investment product produced by the company.

Investors need to be aware of exactly what share class they are buying and the repercussions. Those who are currently invested must ensure that they own the lowest cost share class. Costs matter!

Government relief as 2018 budget is finally approved with Basque MPs' help

■ SUR

MADRID. After a nail-biting finish to the debate, the national government's 2018 budget was approved by a majority of MPs on Wednesday. It had needed the support of other parties in order to get it passed and to keep public services running.

After finally presenting expenditure plans in April, ministers have been pushing the proposals through parliament ever since.

However it was unclear until the last moment if they would get the vital support of the PNV Basque Nationalist party that had said it would vote against if Madrid had not returned full devolved powers to Catalonia by now. In the end the PNV decided to back the budget, saying circumstances had changed.

Working women now account for nearly 40% of global GDP in Andalucía

Notes: Data estimated from employment sector, average hours worked per week and length of the working day, by gender. Source: Produced in-house using data from the INE and IECA.

A study carried out by the Junta de Andalucía's Ministry of Economy shows that women's contribution to the wealth of the region has doubled since 1981

MARÍA DOLORES TORTOSA

SEVILLA. A study by the Junta de Andalucía's Ministry of Economy has concluded that working women doubled the growth of GDP in the region between 1981 and 2017. The study showed that women contribute 39 per cent of overall GDP in Andalucía (62.77 billion euros), compared with 21.1 per cent in the 1980s. At present, the GDP of Andalucía is around 155.21 billion euros.

The study used figures from the National Institute of Statistics (INE) and the Institute of Cartography and Statistics of Andalucía (ICAIE). It took as a starting point the increase in women's employment since the 1980s, how this has contributed to the growth of GDP in the region, and what percentage of that growth can be attributed to working women.

Figures for 1981 show that 19.6 per cent of women in Andalucía had jobs, and now the figure is 50.5 per cent. This is still considerably lower than men (63.9 per cent), but the gap is narrowing because 36 years ago 72.4 per cent of men in Andalucía were working. It should be taken into account that at that time only 22.5 per cent of the active population was female, and now the figure has risen to 43.1 per cent of the total. Nearly one million more women are working now than four decades ago.

From this, the analysis went on to look at men's and women's productivity per hour in different sectors, to estimate their contribution to the generation of gross added value, depending on the total number of hours worked. The document from the ministry explains that the analysts took into account the number of people working, the length of the working day (full or part time), and the average number of hours worked per week in each sector, and differentiated all these variables according to gender.

These calculations showed that the GDP attributable to women's work rose to 62.77 billion euros in Andalucía in 2017, which is 39 per cent of global GDP, compared with 61 per cent by men. This is 17.9 per cent higher than in 1981, when women's employment accounted for barely one-fifth of the total (21.1 per cent).

"This means that between 1981 and 2017, the GDP of Andalucía has accumulated and grown in real terms by 150.6 per cent. The percentage attributable to working women has more than doubled," says the report.

Sources at the ministry say the figures show that the 2.6 per cent real growth in GDP in Andalucía in these 36 years has been sustained by women. Their contribution has grown by an annual rate of 4.4 per cent, compared with 1.9 per cent for men. The analysis also warns that these figures underestimate the real contribution of women to economic activity, because GDP does not take into account unpaid work they carry out.

The report says women who wish to work should be encouraged to do so, and efforts should be made to make more full-time work available to them. At present, 71.6 per cent of part-time jobs are done by women.

19.6 per cent of women had jobs in 1981 and that figure has now risen to 50.5 per cent

GETTING TOO COMFORTABLE

People don't like their politicians to be comfortable. They don't like [them] to have expenses and they don't like [them] being paid. They'd rather [they] lived in a f***ing cave."

These colourfully expressed truths come from the Alastair Campbell-based character Malcolm Tucker, played by Peter Capaldi in the incomparable BBC comedy The Thick of It. The electorate's dislike of politicians' comfort even applies to the types of chairs they have in their offices, as Tucker explains in the same scene: he furiously advises the minister he's breaking in to junk her lumber-support seat with something that's not a "f***ing massive vibrating throne".

There was reason to remember Tucker's swearsome wisdom once again this week, when news of the Podemos leader's house purchase broke. Pablo Iglesias and his partner, Podemos spokeswoman Irene Montero, have been blasted for buying a €600,000 country house outside Madrid. Iglesias' and Montero's critics say that the purchase betrays their responsibilities as leaders of a party representing ordinary workers; and as Montero recognised in a statement after the news emerged, the ordinary Spanish worker could not afford such a property (that was supposed to be her "defence").

Given the double standards that prevail among present-day politicians, it's surprising that such surprise has been voiced at the leftist couple's house purchase. Yet it's precisely because Iglesias presented himself as one of a new breed of Spanish politician - a type that would not do one thing in private and say another in public - that reaction to his and Montero's domestic upgrade has been so swift and angry.

Spaniards, like the British, don't like to see their politicians living more comfortably than the people they supposedly represent - especially when the politicians in question are leftist crusaders who preach social equality. A jaded commitment to double standards is expected from dinosaurs like Rajoy, but the young Podemos duo were supposed to be different. It turns out that they're not that different after all.

It's not just that the leftist MPs have treated themselves to a property that many of their supporters (especially unemployed youngsters or workers on minimum-wage contracts) are unlikely ever to be able to afford. Iglesias is also having to contend with the justified charge of hypocrisy. Back in 2012, he criticised the former Conservative economy minister Luis de Guindos for buying a €600,000 apartment. He's also said to have made disparaging remarks in 2015 about politicians "isolating themselves" by going to live in big houses.

Iglesias has put Housegate to a vote within his party and vowed to resign if members ask him to. The result of Podemos' internal referendum will be known on Monday, but the damage has already been done. Iglesias' and Montero's purchase of the bricks-and-mortar equivalent of a "massive vibrating throne" has revealed them to be very ordinary politicians indeed.

Punish quarriers

I was pleased to read that the council in Alhaurín de la Torre are trying yet again to do something about the continued illegal quarrying in the area.

I am stunned that this is still going on after the 2015 ban. Quarrying is incredibly destructive to the environment and to the habitats of the plants and animals that live in the area. Those still going ahead with it ought to be ashamed of themselves.

I hope that they are fined severely.

Triply disenfranchised

It has just come to my notice that the forthcoming Brexit in March 2019 risks depriving British residents here and in all EU countries of the right to vote in local elections in May 2019.

Not only that, we would also lose the right to vote in the European Parliamentary elections and, if like me you have lived outside UK for more than 15 years, you have already lost the right to vote in British elections, because, despite Theresa May's last electoral promise to re-establish those rights for long term British expatriates, it now appears there will be a delay of some years before this becomes effective.

Now, whatever you voted (or didn't) in the infamous Brexit Referendum, I'm sure you do not wish to become disenfranchised three times. This is a right of all citizens of whichever country. Surely, as we live in Spain, hopefully have got our residential rights and also applied to be on the town hall electoral list we should avail ourselves of the right to partake in local government decisions which affect us all.

Whether you are interested in your voting rights or not, there is a very important principle involved: you may become a total nonentity politically speaking if the Brexit process causes the loss of those rights. Let us hope at least that there is some provision in the negotiating of the Brexit process to cover this anomalous and unjustifiable outcome.

I recommend that you inform the authorities both here and in UK that they must take these rights into account before it is too late.

THIS WEEK'S WINNING LETTER

Guest town

PETER EDGERTON
MUSIC MAKER WWW.E-PETER.COM

The cool midnight breeze blew softly across the Malaga night bringing the kind of nocturnal joy that is just one of the many delights of this time of year before the hammer blow heat of July and August arrives to sap all strength from even the mightiest of men. The spell was soon broken by a shrill disembodied voice from a nearby window.

"Turn your television down!" the culprit shrieked. In English.

No "Excuse me" no "Please" and, certainly no Spanish. Here we had the perfect symbol of Malaga city centre in its current form - a rapidly dwindling number of native inhabitants surviving daily amid an influx of over-confident tourists who, having paid an arm and a leg to spend a week in a small flat, feel justified in imposing their wishes on the bewildered few remainers.

The whole point is that having a full volume television on at all hours is as much a part of the Malaga culture as are 'espetos', 'pitufos' and shrugging your shoulders as a valid form of answering a question. As a tourist, or foreign inhabitant, you can't pick and choose the aspects of the "authentic" Malaga that you want to form part of your experience. In the same way as some people will walk a small stretch of the Camino de Santiago and have their luggage transported separately by a company paid to commit such atrocities, only to return home extolling the magnificence and profundity of the experience, these days visitors get back from Malaga praising a truly Spanish city but actually having seen nothing of the sort.

The locals jokingly call their town Malagaluf these days, owing to the ever-increasing number of stag and hen parties that proliferate. Only recently on Calle Larios, Malaga's most emblematic street, I witnessed a baldy middle-aged bloke in a lower division English football shirt yelling at his topless chum who was a good fifty yards away

"Dave! Dave! Oy, Dave! Over 'ere, mate!"

Dave's pal banged on for ages, seemingly unaware of the beautifully dressed Spanish families out for an afternoon stroll, looking on agape. I'm not sure how the whole thing ended because I legged it sharpish, hanging my head in shame.

If you're visiting a foreign city, surely the correct way to behave is as any guest would. I've lived here for twenty-three years and, of course, have experienced some moments of discomfort owing to a clash of cultures along the way. Actually, I had a neighbour once who had his TV on at full volume every night until about three o'clock.

I ended up yelling at him in English "Turn your television down!"

Only kidding - I bought some ear plugs.

Man of the match

REVD ADRIAN LOW
ANGLICAN CHAPLAIN, COSTA DEL SOL WEST

In a semi-wake state early last Sunday morning I heard TRE radio telling me that the Man of the Match was Bishop Curry from the USA. He wasn't playing for either Chelsea or Manchester United. He was the preacher at the royal wedding. He was brilliant. Some said he was too long, others that it wasn't sombre enough for the occasion, but Bishop Curry certainly got my vote.

His sermon caught the imagination of the congregation. I was asked, before the Sunday San Pedro 10am service started, if I would be "doing a Curry" that morning. Certainly "doing a Curry" will have a new meaning in our household from now on!

If you missed it, watch it on catch up. When I heard that two billion watched the royal wedding (more than one quarter of the population of the world), I had to do a double take to hear the number again. Did two billion people really hear Bishop Curry talk about the power of love in Jesus Christ and how that power can revolutionise our world?

There among the most shiny of people (Hello magazine photographers must have been in their element) with the most expensive gowns and outlandish hats, this man told them that the commands Jesus quoted, to love God and love our neighbour (and ourselves as well), were completely key to our quality of life. If only we could incorporate the power of love into our families (camera pans across faces of people thinking about families), into our politics (camera had already found a politician or two), into our business life (camera searching for business people), and social media (camera zooms out - they are all on social media!), then we would have a new world, an extraordinarily brilliant world - an as-God-planned-it-to-be world.

It was moving stuff. Unusually for a sermon (I know!) no one nodded off, people were focused wondering what this guy going to say next.

Meanwhile I'm thinking about what I am going to preach at Pentecost (the day after the wedding). Pentecost was when 'all of them' - that is the early church, 120 or so, were all in one place and the Holy Spirit lifted their hearts and minds to a new understanding of what God needed them to be. It transformed them.

I remember being ordained in Lichfield Cathedral. I was nervous, focused on the words we had practised (and the fact that the bishop's shoelace was undone). Suddenly something happened and along with virtually all in the cathedral, we were crying and laughing. However unemotional Church of England I was meant to be, we were engulfed by a power beyond ourselves. It was amazing and life-changing.

If Bishop Curry's sermon touched only one tenth of one per cent of those who listened, then two million will have felt that same Spirit stirring in them. If it was you - Halleluia! See you on Sunday!

Recognition at a royal wedding

The British ambassador hosted a garden party for a cross-section of the community

by RACHEL HAYNES

MADRID. The springy green lawn behind the British ambassador's residence in Madrid was disturbed by stiletto heels and tent poles on Saturday as guests turned up in their finery to celebrate the royal wedding. Few British residents in Spain had an invite to the real thing in Windsor, so the next best thing was to watch Prince Harry and Meghan Markle make their vows and become the Duke and Duchess of Sussex in this little corner of Great Britain created in the heart of Spain.

The ambassador, Simon Manley, and his wife, María Isabel Fernández, had not just invited their neighbours. The garden, decorated with bunting bearing faces of the happy couple, was occupied by guests who had travelled from all over Spain for the occasion.

As Manley explained, they had followed the lead of the bride and groom, who had invited 2,000 volunteers to the grounds of Windsor Castle, and opened his residence to a cross-section of Britons from across this country "who contribute day in, day out, to their communities".

Four large TV screens set up both inside the house and under the awnings in the garden were prepared to ensure that no one missed the important events of the day.

However the ambassador and the British consuls had not brought people from across the country to let Harry and Meghan take all the limelight. As a special sign of appreciation of their work for the community, Manley gave out certificates to individuals and organisations.

"I am constantly amazed, as I travel round this country, by the level of their contributions," he said, before the British consul for Andalucía and the Canary Islands, Charmaine Arbouin, read out the names in various categories: local ambassadors and honorary consuls; community organisations; military; churches and cemetery foundations; help with law and finance issues; British associations; education; town halls; and expat press.

The Costa del Sol was well represented with members of a number of associations, charities, firms and the media, including this newspaper, picking up certificates.

There was little time to admire the awards, though, as the big moment of the day was approaching: the arrival of the bride at Windsor.

Some dabbed at teary eyes as they took in the important moments: the dress, the singing, the entertaining sermon - which earned applause from the front row - and the all-important vows, after which the ambassador let out a cheer from somewhere behind the heads glued to the screen.

What the guests perhaps did not realise was that as they were watching their royal wedding, they were being watched, by the Spanish press.

To back up their coverage of the wedding, the national TV channels had sent their cameras to the ambassador's house. The result on one national channel was a report with images of the wedding itself alternating with footage and interviews from the British scene in Madrid.

A rendition of God Save the Queen by the ambassador's youngest daughter, Natasha, was a final gift for the guests, who eventually made their way out of the house and garden, leaving the lawn to get back to normal ready for the next party.

Recently, the neighbours have decided to elect me as president of the community of owners. I hardly have time due to my work commitments, and though I am grateful for the trust placed in me, I think it would be advisable to refuse the post. Moreover, I do not want to have to deal with constant problems or to upset my relationships with the rest of the inhabitants because of those problems. In order to renounce the post, is it necessary to do it in writing or in an official way?

In principle, it is not so easy to renounce the post, and it cannot be done unless there exist justified reasons that make impossible to hold the position. Therefore, and unless the rest of the owners agree that a different person takes over, it is necessary to ask for it at court, justifying the reasons for the refusal. The judge will decide if the request is justified and if therefore it is appropriate to designate a different person as president.

REF. R. E. E.

I have a TV, which I bought in a very well-known appliance store, and it is no longer working. I took it to the shop and they told me that the set was no longer covered by the guarantee (I bought it three years ago), and if I wanted to repair it, I would have to pay for it. I accepted, because the TV had not been cheap and I did not want to spend more money on a new one. However, ten weeks after the repair, the TV went wrong again, and I have been told that I will have to pay again if I want it to be repaired! Is it legal that they can try to charge me again?

In principle it is not. Repairs must have a guarantee of at least three months, and therefore if the TV has stopped working again within the guarantee period of the repair, you are entitled to have it repaired without having to pay anything. A different question would be if the reason for it stopping working was different from the one that caused the first breakdown, in which case, as it is caused by a different fault, you would have to pay for the repair.

Not a pleasant task

When you deal with pets there are a number of pleasant duties like walking the dogs in the countryside, and unpleasant tasks like dealing with ticks which are around at this time of the year. One of our cats has just come home with one.

I recall a time some years ago when I spent four days living in a slum in Naples researching a film and occupying a shack with a charming illiterate family and in my spare time attempting to improve the lot of their animals. Getting a good second-hand saddle from the street market was easy. It fitted the donkey and I showed them how to use it so the donkey suffered no sores. Building a larger cage for the birds was not difficult but the really unpleasant task was removing the numerous ticks on the dogs. That really made me feel queasy. They are such revolting creatures. I showed the family how to do the task and explained that they suck blood from the dogs.

Ticks are tiny spider like creatures which are difficult to spot in the early stage. However when they take a hefty blood meal from your pet they can grow up to fifty times their normal size and look like a large greyish white pea. That is usually when the pet owner becomes aware of them. They are not to be ignored and should be removed. The way I deal with them is to dab them with a cloth or cotton wool soaked with alcohol like gin. Leave the tick for two minutes so it releases its grip on the skin then using tweezers pull them off and burn them. Do not throw them away as they recover to infect another animal. Dab the infected spot on the skin with Betadon. You can buy special removing tweezers at your vet or pet shop.

It is a good idea to purchase at the same place a tick collar which protects your pet. Get a good collar which has Amitraz like Scalibor. Avoid cheap alternatives. Pets have an irritating habit of removing the collar by pawing and they are usually lost. Here is a useful tip: on the loose end of the collar past the buckle apply glue and hold it against the main collar until the glue dries.

Bombing of Alicante central market kills defenceless civilians

TONY BRYANT

✉ tonysureng@gmail.com

On Wednesday 25 May 1938, General Francisco Franco launched one of the deadliest and most cowardly acts of the Spanish Civil War. At around 11am, as hundreds of people in Alicante - a city loyal to the Republicans - went about their daily chores, several bombers from the Italian Legionary Air Force mounted an aerial attack on the town's central market.

The market was bristling with activity as people bought their groceries, unaware that they were about to be obliterated by more than 90 high-explosive bombs. People ran for cover in terror as the bombs wreaked havoc and carnage, killing and maiming between 275 and 393 people. Reports claimed that the death toll included 100 men, 56 women, ten children as well as more than 100 unidentified bodies. There was also said to have been more than 1,000 people injured in the attack. Historian and Hispanist, Paul Preston, claimed that "several hundred" civilians were killed, but as with the bombings in Guernica in 1937, the actual total of fatalities has been often contested.

Franco ordered the raids following the Aragon Offensive earlier in the year, when Nationalist troops destroyed the Republican forces, took over

The central market building in the 21st century. :: SUR

Aragon, and conquered parts of Catalonia and the Levante.

Francisco wanted to destroy the Republican morale and eliminate its maritime commerce and so he authorised the Italian air force to undertake indiscriminate bombings of Republican cities like Valencia, Barcelona, Alicante and Granollers.

Between seven and nine Italian SM79 and SM81 bombers took part in the raids, which were aided by the fact that the anti-aircraft artillery of the city was obsolete and the air raid siren didn't work.

The Legionary Air Force, whose main base of operations was in Mallorca, was set up in 1936 to provide logistical and tactical support to the rebel faction at the onset of the Civil War.

The raid on Alicante's central market was one of the deadliest aerial bombings of the war and provoked protests in London, as several British ships were damaged in the raids.

In May 2013, a memorial plaque was installed in the square behind the market. However it was vandalised shortly after it was inaugurated - which suggests that for some, this bitter feud has still not been completely laid to rest - but it was repaired and remains a memory of the atrocities of this devastating conflict.

LEGAL Last Friday, the 18th of May, the Law Firm Pérez de Vargas Abogados held a seminar about tax residency and lease of properties for touristic purposes. It took place at the Hotel H10 Estepona Palace

ESSENTIAL TAX RESIDENCE AND LEASE FOR TOURISTIC PURPOSES ADVICE AT PÉREZ DE VARGAS ABOGADOS SEMINAR IN ESTEPONA

ESTEPONA

As in other seminars held by this prestigious and consolidated law firm with an international vocation, the purpose of the same was to address topical issues and issues that may generate doubts or concerns to the real estate purchaser in the Costa del Sol. Thus, issues addressed had great acceptance among the invited guests. The seminar was arranged by its Department of Foreign Investments and hosted by the Lawyers Miriam Aranzazu Segura and Kristina Gorokhova.

First lecture was carried out by the Lawyer Javier Pérez de Vargas, specialist in Real State Law, who during the same tried to summarize most relevant aspects of law ruling lease of properties for touristic purposes, as well as existing differences with long term rentals of properties. Moreover, Javier Pérez de Vargas explained during his speech which are the requirements for commercializing properties for the said touristic purpose (registration at the Touristic Registry, services to be provided by the owner of the apartment and minimum elements to be included in the contract). Following to that, requirements for commercialization of apartments are not exactly trivial, as their fulfilment is subject to inspection of the Regional Board of Tourism and to a penalty regimen. Lecture regarding leases ended up with taxation generated by the same.

Second addressed issue in the seminar consisted of tax residency, and its speaker was the Lawyer José Castellano, specialist in Commerce and Tax Law. During his speech, there were explained criteria established by Spanish law in order for a person to be deemed as tax resident in Spain. In this sense, it shall be recalled that the tax Administration will consider an individual to be tax resident in Spain when any of the following circumstances takes place:

- That he/she stays more than 183 days, during a calendar year, in Spanish territory. In order to determine such period of stay in Spanish territory sporadic absences shall count, unless tax residency in other country is proved.

- That main core or base of his/her activities or economic interests are directly or indirectly located in Spain.

My host for the morning, Antonio of 'Cómete Menorca' sees me take a break, as I plant myself in a bright red director's chair on one of the café terraces outside Ciutadella's 19th-century fish market. It was the ideal place to take a short breather from the vibrancy of the city market. "There are two things popular across the world that were invented in Menorca," Antonio asserts with a smile. "Salsa mahonesa and the silla menorquina!"

Until that moment it had not really occurred to me to think where the ubiquitous canvas folding chairs had originated; I had assumed in the States. Yet the design is said have been popularised on Menorca over a century ago. The story of the creation of mayonnaise (or should I say 'mahonesa') however is a little more controversial. Yet it's undeniably a big part of the island's fascinating cu-

Slow food

My morning had started deep in the countryside, at a farmstead called Finca Torralbet, as part of a new travel experience where guests can visit local food producers, regional markets, and learn about seasonal foods. The high point of the day is to help prepare and then enjoy a lunch hosted by local restaurant association 'Còmete Menorca' in collaboration with Chef Silvia Anglada and her partner Toni, both passionate advocates for sustainable farming, and healthy, tasty, seasonal food.

Travellers are coming to Menorca not simply for the island's Mediterranean climate, pristine coastal waters and sandy coves, but for its vibrant Balearic food scene. Menorca's refreshing lack of tourist developments, combined with a traditional, rural way of life, has made it the ideal destination for slow travel, where visitors can relish experiences of nature, history and local cuisine.

I welcomed the opportunity to join a food tour; these experiences are a growing travel trend and a compelling way to become immersed within the island's culture. The market in Ciutadella, the former capital of Menorca, is one of the liveliest places in this peaceful, architecturally-rich city. Cafés and bars with terraces furnished with colourful director chairs and simple wooden tables surround the fish market and adjacent food traders. A visit here is to become engaged with the rural economy of Menorca, one that is being protected and developed by associations and cooperatives that recognise the value of the island's sustainable way of life.

Chef Silvia Anglada regards Finca Torralbet as one of the best places to source homemade cured pork sausages such as the paprika-flavoured sobrasada and artisan Menorcan cheeses made from the estate's sheep, goats and cows. Fish and meat though are sourced directly from the market – and part of the fun of this tour is to see professional chef Anglada deftly navigate the stalls and vendors, as she is choosing produce for the day's lunch.

Okm dining

Our arrival at her restaurant Es Tast De Na Silvia was the reward for our long morning out in the countryside and market. Once inside this classic stone building, found in a narrow street in Ciutadella's historic centre, one finds a welcoming space that is bright and elegant, with white-washed wooden furniture, and tables dressed with natural linens and vases of wild flowers. The place had a wholesome yet sophisticated ambience.

Chef Silvia beckoned us to join her in the large open-plan kitchen, with its large central island. Little time was lost in preparing the meal while her partner Tony explained the wines that would accompany the dishes.

Island wine

Wine production is seeing a renaissance on the island, with a growing number of boutique wineries opening alongside the island's rural hotels and guest houses. Hotel Torralbenc, a stylish rural hotel, twenty minutes west of the capital Mahón, reminded me of the gourmet food and wine hotels of South Africa's Western Cape, or northern California. It has opened a small winery and 2018 sees the launch of its first red, white and rosé vintages. It's an interesting base for a holiday on the island.

With my stomach rumbling, we

Menorca is remarkably resourceful when it comes to food. :: SUR took our seats at the table, for the highlight of this Menorca foodie experience; a multiple-course lunch of small plates, each celebrating the late spring produce of the island – spicy sobrasada with organic honey; then a rocket fritter with a subtly sweet and flavoursome tomato sauce; an unusual carob cracker with butifarra sausage; delicate scorpion fish, freshly caught off the island's deep reefs; tender Menorca beef; and finally, a board of cheeses from Finca Torralbet.

The presentation of the menu reflected a fine dining restaurant; yet the style was unpretentious and of course almost everything was sourced locally that morning. It's a captivating and satisfying experience. Es Tast De Na Silvia is a certified Slow Food restaurant on Menorca; their approach to hospitality and dining complements Menorca's 25 years as a Biosphere Reserve, validation of the island's unique natural environment and its commitment to sustainability.

Its diminutive size has made Menorca remarkably resourceful over the centuries, creating a diverse cuisine that not only reflects the landscape but also the island's colourful history. Menorca's strategic position in the Mediterranean, combined with its natural, deep harbours and protected anchorages has made the island an attractive prize for various invading powers. These occupying forces have in turn shaped Menorca's gastronomic identity, from the British leaving a heritage of gin distilling on the island, to the French adoption of Menorca's 'salsa mahonesa'.

Mahonesa or mayonesa?

As our meal ended, the conversation inevitably turned to mahonesa – the sauce made famous by the French yet proudly recognised as created on Menorca – taking its name from the city of Mahón. Antonio my host, holds out an old recipe book, Art de la Cuina (art of cuisine) by Friar Roger, a mid-18th century text in the local Menorquin language. Among its recipes are different interpretations of aioli, the garlic and olive oil sauce, regarded as the precursor to mahonesa. This is cited as proof that salsa mahonesa was created on the island before the French arrived. The French may have tweaked the recipe and made it their own, but no one on Menorca will let you be in any doubt that it's a Menorca creation – just like those comfy director chairs.

WHERE IN THE WORLD?

Period drama

:: ROGER HOWARD / FLICKR

Next month this square will be taken back to the 15th century, with all the pageantry that entails, when it is turned into a sporting venue to which crowds flock every year from all around the world.

The sport played, however, is not one immediately recognisable by modern standards, but does incorporate a number of features now associated with football and rugby.

The official rules of this occasionally brutish game were first published in 1580 but it was played long before that when it was invented by aristocrats and played every night between Epiphany and Lent.

Played in teams of 27 and using both feet and hands, goals are scored by throwing the ball over a designated spot on the perimeter of the field.

Each game lasts 50 minutes with the winner being the team with the most 'cacce', or points scored.

This tradition still continues now with all of the period costumes and parades still a focal point of proceedings.

This year, the teams competing in the semifinals were drawn on Easter Sunday by drawing painted balls and they will take place on 9 and 10 June, ahead of the final on 24 June, the city's feast day.

If you know where this is, you could win a prize.

Please send the name of the city and the name of this sporting event to english@diariosur.es. Only entries with your full name, delivery address and telephone number will be considered.

Marbella youngster shines on US TV

Talented Charlotte Summers sang to an audience of millions on Little Big Shots

✉ ashbolton@hotmail.com

MARBELLA. A Marbella youngster is celebrating after performing to millions of viewers on a popular US TV show.

Charlotte Summers appeared on Little Big Shots after a video clip of her singing in Marbella went viral and caught the attention of the show's bosses.

The 12-year-old previously sang on Spanish TV show La Voz Kids at the age of nine, where she reached the semi-finals.

In her latest performance on the American TV show, the youngster belted out a rendition of It's a Man's World.

Charlotte, who goes to school at Las Chapas in El Rosario, got to visit Los Angeles and Hollywood for her trip to the US.

She told SUR in English: "I loved going to Los Angeles as it was a dream of mine. I was able to meet Fifth Harmony and saw Sam Smith and James Gordon while I was going to record Little Big Shots.

"I really loved everything about the US and visited places like the Walk of Fame."

Charlotte, who was born in Spain and has an English father and Spanish mother, started singing at the age of six in school plays and got her first big break singing in Les Misérables at the Teatro Cervantes in Malaga.

Her father, Simon Summers, 49, who works in real estate, explained how she ended up on the US TV show after getting her hair cut in La Cañada shopping centre, Marbella.

He said: "One of the hairdressers asked her to sing something, as she recognised her from La Voz Kids. She sang a bit of a song that she had specially recorded for a competition, called Unicorn, and the hairdresser uploaded it. It went viral and has been seen by more than 20 million people world-wide.

"We were contacted by the producers of Little Big Shots who had seen the video and realised how good she is. The show is all about showcasing children with talent, who get interviewed by the presenter Steve Harvey and then perform."

Polo draws in the crowds

The first Costa del Sol Beach Polo Cup attracted over 2,000 spectators to the Kempinski Hotel Bahía in Estepona

== SUR IN ENGLISH

ESTEPONA. International polo teams battled it out over two days last weekend in the first Costa del Sol Beach Polo Cup held in Estepona. International players included patrons Niclas Johansson, Veronica and Lauran Desmas, Jaspar and Kate Kühlwein and the high level professionals Jamie Le Hardy, Santi Torreguitar and Hernan Pieres.

The final was played between Perrier Jouet and Kempinski Hotel Bahía, with both teams battling it out until the end, when Kempinski Hotel Bahía eventually achieved victory.

The winners were presented with their trophies by the mayor of Estepona, José María García Urbano. The mayor congratulated Isabel de Borbón and her polo events company, Polo4Ever, for its work in promoting beach polo on the Costa del Sol and the principal sponsor Kempinski Hotel Bahía for its work in bringing the innovative sporting event to Estepona.

The event was attended by both locals and polo enthusiasts who were keen to see the action up close. The excellent weather conditions made it an ideal setting for the event, which the mayor has confirmed will be held at the same location in subsequent years.

Following the matches there were two separate events held at the Spiler Beach Club, which were attended by prominent members of local society including Countess Gu-nilla Bismarck, Princess Bea Auer-sperg, Princess María and Prince Pa-blo Von Hohenlohe with their daughters Allegra and Cecilia.

Folklore and gastronomy of Argentina celebrated in Torremolinos

The festival presented traditional folk music and spectacular tango and ballet performances

:: TONY BRYANT

TORREMOLINOS. The Argentinian community of the Costa del Sol celebrated the Fiesta Gaucha in Torremolinos last weekend. The three-day festival, which promoted the folklore, music and gastronomy of Argentina, was organised by Torremolinos town hall.

Held in the Plaza La Nogalera, the festival takes its name from the skilled horsemen known as gauchos, a national symbol in Argentina.

This is the first year the festival has been held in Torremolinos and it is now set to become a regular feature on the town's cultural calendar.

Live music and entertainment took place on the main stage throughout the afternoon and included traditional Argentinian folk music and spectacular tango and ballet shows.

One of the main attractions was the large grill area, where suckling pig, whole racks of ribs and steaks were cooked over wood and charcoal barbecues.

Visitors could also sample an array of traditional Argentinian specialities, like 'empanadas' (spicy meat pasties), and Quilmes, one of Argentina's favourite beers.

MALAGA. The Palacio de Ferias and Congresos in Malaga was host last weekend to the third edition of Sal n de la Moto y la Bicicleta, a popular motorcycle and bike show.

The event, which ran from Friday to Sunday, displayed more than 60 makes of vehicle as well as an extensive programme of exhibitions, competitions and test-drives.

Due to increasing market demand, the show offered an ample selection of electric motorbikes to potential buyers, including models from Lifan, Torrot, Zero, Goodyear and Askoll.

The most luxurious motorbike for sale was the Ducati 1299, priced at 100,000 euros.

Cycling enthusiasts also enjoyed a sizeable collection of non-motor bicycles.

The mayor, Francisco de la Torre, attended the opening of the event. In a speech, he highlighted the important role of electrically-powered vehicles: "They are a way to contribute to reducing emissions of CO<sub>2</sub>," he said.

GARDENING

Armeria maritima

Sea thrift, a hardy perennial herb, loves dry, sandy soils and can also tolerate salty winds and spray

Common names for this hardy European native include sea thrift, sea pink, cliff rose, March daisy and sea gilliflower. In Spanish it is called 'clavelina del mar'.

In its native habitat it can be found growing in coastal areas and dry sandy areas across Europe, in Serbia and the Americas.

Armeria is a genus in the Plumbaginaceae family with just a few sub species. It can tolerate copper soil contamination and can also withstand salty soils and winds but must have free-draining soil or it will rot. It is drought-tolerant once established and is invaluable for xeriscaping.

Sea Thrift has narrow, dark-green leaves which form a mound of foliage approximately 30cm by 30cm. The mound will spread slowly and the middle may die back. If this happens, the clump can be divided to produce new plants. It can also be propagated by basal cuttings and by seed.

The dense, rounded clusters of purple, pink or white blooms form on tall slender stems and usually appear from early spring to mid-summer. They attract bees and butterflies and although Sea thrift will grow in partial shade, it needs full sun to reach maximum flowering potential. Deadheading will extend the flowering period.

Sea thrift can be used as edging, in borders or in containers. It is especially popular as a rockery plant. Armeria 'Vesuvius' has smoky purple leaves which form a stunning contrast to the bright pink blooms.

Sea thrift was used for the design on the back of the British threepenny bit between 1937 and 1952.

Extracts of the leaves and roots of Armeria are said to have antibiotic properties and can be used to treat obesity, nervous disorders and urinary infections.

AMARYLLIS, A LOVESICK GIRL

This photograph of a gorgeous, red amaryllis was sent in by Ann Pennington. According to Greek mythology, Amaryllis was a maiden who fell in love with cold-hearted Ateo. She stabbed herself through the heart with a golden arrow and then walked to his house to declare her love for him. The drops of blood she shed grew into beautiful scarlet flowers and Ateo fell in love with her. Her heart healed and the flower was named amaryllis - that is, until it was reclassified in the genus Hippeastrum in the 1800s.

GARDENING HINTS

Damage limitation

If like me, you took advantage of the brief sunny spell to plant out some seedlings you are probably regretting it right now. The return of the heavy rain and in some cases hail, (especially if you live inland from the coast), have knocked the lot flat. Drastic measures taken included using an old window as a cloche and even water bottles with the top cut off to cover the delicate little plants. Ideally hooped covers would be best, but whatever you use make sure that they are well anchored and, as soon as the sun comes out, take it all off again as the condensation that forms inside could cause damping off. And, it's not too late to re-sow if you need to; you'll be surprised how quickly new seedlings will catch up, especially now as the weather warms up. Remember to water in the morning and use a fine rose or attach a mister nozzle to the hose.

Royal British Legion Coín Breakfast at Rosie's

Members and guests of the Coín Branch of the Royal British Legion met for the annual breakfast at Rosie's at 10am last week. For the first time ever the breakfast represented two special occasions, commemorating the 2018 Armed Forces day and celebrating the Royal Wedding held the following day.

The breakfast raised over 200 euros for the 2018 Poppy Appeal.

The club is holding a paella evening in aid of the 2018 Poppy Appeal on Friday 22 June at 7.30pm at La Tavola by Miky in Sierra Gorda. Lesley Harrison will be there to entertain with popular songs from the 1950s to the noughties. Tickets priced at 15 euros are available from George: 666721090.

Lux Mundi Torre del Mar

Spring events

First was the Spring Fashion show held in April which drew a large audience to watch the models on the catwalk show off some of the fashions from the boutique. Then, at the beginning of May, Lux Mundi held the Spring Bazaar and sold a variety of items including home-made cards, jewellery, jams, craft items, bric-a-brac and clothing etc. Three local authors were also present, Joan Fallon, John Hardy and Patricia Gabbitas, who were signing books. With the invaluable help from everyone involved, Lux Mundi raises funds for its charitable work.

ADVERTORIAL Vetiver Spain

Now is the time to plant

Vetiver Spain, a certified supplier and one of the EU's largest producers of Vetiver plants, would like to remind those interested in reaping the benefits of the grass system that now is the perfect time to plant.

Vetiver grass systems bring a number of key benefits including erosion control, soil conservation, water purification/storage and is also a highly nutritious animal feed and an effective compost that reduces weed growth and naturally repels insects. Plants quickly grow to heights of 2 or more metres, so are also great wind breaks.

The grass tolerates a large range of climatic conditions including drought, floods, extreme temperatures and high concentrations of contaminants. It is non-invasive and co-exists well with other types of plant. In fact, its long, dense roots (which can reach to 3-4 metres) boost soil moisture and improve production of nearby crops.

Vetiver Spain have found that planting Vetiver near avocado trees not only enabled the trees to produce fruit within two years (well before this could usually be expected) but also protected them from winter winds, meaning just one of 250 young trees was lost to gales. Worldwide agricultural studies have found that planting Vetiver nearby can increase crop yields by up to 30%.

Vetiver's other main benefit for landowners and gardeners is its incredible erosion control capacity. The roots form an organic 'underground wall' that effectively reduces soil erosion and water runoffs. The Spanish government has employed Vetiver to stabilise farm roads with steep roadside slopes to halt rock slides and mud slides, with great results. It also actually repairs and protects land, gullies and areas with erosion and landslide potentials.

For more information on all the benefits of Vetiver, call 692 288 657, email vetiverspain@gmail.com or visit www.vetiverspain.com

OBITUARY

Judith Price

:: PEDRO LUIS GÓMEZ

MALAGA. After an 18-year-long fight against cancer, Judith Price passed away on Wednesday last week, surrounded by her loved ones.

Judith, a British woman with Malaga in her heart and soul, played an important role in the promotion of the Costa del Sol and Andalucía and was a great tourism entrepreneur. She was also a great fan of Malaga CF, a team she followed everywhere with her husband Manuel Toledo. Her funeral, at the International Cemetery in Benalmádena, had moments of grief, and also joy, as she always had a smile on her face. Her fight against cancer is an example to many. At her funeral, as she had wanted, there was music, white flowers and fine words... and a very special farewell: words of gratitude to the team of oncologists at Malaga's Materno hospital.

Judith was an extraordinary woman. She will be missed at the tourism congresses, at the events she organised, at La Rosaleda or the Hotel Larios from where she watched the Easter processions, although this year she only managed to see her favourites.

There must be a reason why the good people always go first. God must want to have them close and calls them before the worthless others, who are all still down here.

Pedro de Tapia, lord of the manor and Plaza Mayor

The fourth centenary of one of the most important works in 17th century Madrid has revealed new information about the man who founded Villanueva de Tapia

FERNANDO TORRES

✉ Twitter: @fernandotorresu

The only book of poetry written by Cervantes is dedicated to the son of the royal advisor in an attempt to curry favour and obtain his patronage

MÁLAGA. Madrigal de las Altas Torres and Villanueva de Tapia have a great deal in common. The former, in Ávila, was the birthplace of Pedro de Tapia y Rivera in the second half of the 16th century; he is known in history for his close links with the crown, his position as a lawyer and senior civil servant and for overseeing one of the most important civil projects in Madrid in the 17th century: the demolition of the Plaza Vieja and the construction of the present Plaza Mayor.

Villanueva de Tapia, the village in the north of Málaga province, was purchased by De Tapia from Felipe III for 12,000 ducats, to satisfy his longing to become a lord of the manor, which was one of the highest ranks of the nobility at that time.

This was largely unknown until last year, during preparations to mark the fourth centenary of the construction of the Plaza Mayor in Madrid (1617-1619). There is a plaque dedicated to Pedro de Tapia on one side of the square; the Centre of Madrid Studies (CEM) decided to find out more about him and went to Madrid historian Isidoro Otero, who has published numerous articles in specialist magazines about the founder of Villanueva de Tapia.

Otero says Pedro de Tapia became “a key player in the ‘Madrid de los Austrias’ [Madrid of the Austrians or Habsburgs]”, and that it all started from his career as a jurist, a profession which led him to travel all over Spain.

“He studied law in Valladolid, and after that he had a splendid ‘cursus honorum’, and a spectacular climb up the professional ladder,” Otero says. De Tapia began as a judge of the chancelleries - the old law courts - in Madrid and then Valladolid and Granada. During his time in Andalucía he met Clara del Rosal, who would later become his wife.

“He became the warden of Loja castle and held an important position in society, but it wasn’t enough: he wanted to be lord over vassals, in other words to join the gentry,” explains Otero.

In order to do that he would need to own land, and it was then that he discovered a place that was the subject of dispute between the House of Iznájar and the House of Osuna.

This area, known as Entredicho, did not officially belong to any municipality, so he told Felipe III, to whom he was senior adviser, that he would like to buy it. Thanks to his close relationship with the king, he was able to obtain the land and then the jurisprudence for a bargain price. By 1605, De Tapia was the lord of the manor which now bore his name, imparted justice and collected taxes from all the agricultural production on the land.

Once in the comfortable position as Lord of Villanueva de Tapia, he was given a very special commission by Felipe III. Previously, the Duke of Lerma had persuaded the king to move the capital city to Valladolid, in what was really just a major speculation operation.

This lasted for a few years, but then the monarch decided to move the court back to Madrid again. However, he missed the Plaza Mayor in the town of Pisuegra, so in 1617 he ordered the Plaza Vieja in Madrid to be demolished and the present Plaza Mayor to be built. De Tapia came onto the scene as the project director, which shows how highly the king thought of him.

The whole of this ambitious project was placed in the hands of this man who had founded the village in Málaga. He chose Juan Gómez de Mora, one of the most highly valued designers in the early years of Spanish Baroque, as the architect.

“The square is all down to him, but the only tribute to him is the plaque,” says Otero. The idea was that all the city’s important events would take place in the Plaza Mayor. “These squares were to Baroque what the amphitheatres were to ancient Greece or football stadiums are now; they are where the power was instrumentalised.”

Thanks to De Tapia’s project management, this square in Madrid became an example for other major cities in Spain and Europe.

Patronage

Isidoro Otero explains that most writers in Spain’s Golden Age sought the favour of high-ranking officials, of whom Pedro de Tapia was one. The best example of this is the only work of poetry produced by Cervantes, which he dedicated to the official’s son, Rodrigo de Tapia, because he wanted his father’s favour.

De Tapia also knew Lope de Vega, who refers to him in several works, and came under scrutiny by Juan de Tassis, Count of Villamediana. The critic, who was “the stone in the monarchy’s shoe” attacked Pedro de Tapia in a satirical poem because of his privileged position.

De Tapia never lived in his village, although he is said to have paid short courtesy visits from time to time. Nevertheless, these days Villanueva de Tapia, in Málaga province, has reason to be proud of its prestigious beginnings.

Chefs and Kids take over Los Monteros hotel

Over 120 pupils took part in cookery workshops and two hundred diners attended a charity dinner to raise funds to help children without families

■ MARINA MARTÍNEZ

MÁLAGA. Most people will remember being told not to play with their food at some time in their life but on Monday last week, some very famous chefs encouraged young children to do exactly that. Painting with plankton with Ángel León or smearing themselves with chocolate with Eneko Atxa, were just two of the activities at the Chefs and Kids event in Los Monteros hotel in Marbella, an initiative in aid of Aldeas Infantiles (a charity which helps to provide education and homes to children with no family), organised by Avalon.

The top chefs, who brought with them a constellation of over 40 Michelin stars, met to give cookery workshops and a to prepare a charity dinner for two hundred guests.

"All the chefs we contacted said 'yes' straight away," said the hotel manager, Fernando Al-Farkh at the inauguration of the event which was opened by Ángeles Muñoz, mayor of Marbella.

"It is a privilege and an honour that Marbella is so closely linked to haute cuisine and even more so that we are supporting an initiative like this one; Marbella is an ideal place for it," she commented.

Her deputy, Jacobo Florido; José Moro, the president of Bodegas Emilio Moro; Javier Vigil, the regional director of Aldeas Infantiles; Benjamin Lana, editorial director of Regional Media from the Vocento group; and Carlos Maribona, food critic and contributor to Vocento; were also at opening ceremony.

Playing with colours

In total 24 chefs from Michelin-starred restaurants and 120 children aged between six and 12 years old from the Federico García Lorca, Nuestra Señora del Carmen, Platero and Santa Teresa schools in Marbella (selected through a painting competition) took part in the cooking sessions.

Nine-year-old Daniela Medina, was ambitious enough to make a pizza with the Kiko Moya team while Kevin Palma, 11, made sure his vegetable offering, proposed by Paco Roncero, was perfect, even though he didn't intend to eat it afterwards as he doesn't like vegetables. Twelve-year-old Lola Ogalla however, said she would definitely like to try the salmon rolls she made with Fina Puigdevall of the restaurant Les Cols.

"It's just a case of insisting and playing with the colours, making fruit and vegetables easy to eat," said Puigdevall while helping her young kitchen assistants who were desperate to get autographs from all the chefs. Dani García even had a queue waiting for him: "It is probably because everyone knows me around here," he clarified in front of his legion of followers.

Others had done their homework such as the students from the Nuestra Señora del Carmen school, and had already completed projects on healthy eating habits and even started their own vegetable plots.

The garden of the hotel was filled with laughter, colour and the odd battle with chocolate and plankton with not a single chef being left without some 'war wound' on his jacket.

Jacobo Florido underlined the purpose of the event: "This is what we need to instil in children, that with hard work and effort you can do anything. The little ones deserve happiness."

After all, they are the future, pointed out Martín Berasategui, "It is up to us to help them. We are the conveyors of happiness and they are the ones who convey most happiness to us."

"They say that we are what we eat but I do not know if I want to be what I eat because today people do not eat well or take care of the planet. You have to start teaching children to care for the planet and to take care of themselves," said Diego Guerrero, who has been working with Aldeas Infantiles for several years.

Gala dinner

For the gala dinner that same evening, Dani García had designed a menu for the guests which he prepared along with eight other chefs. The two hundred diners paid 350 euros each for the meal with the proceeds going to Aldeas Infantiles.

CRUISE SHIPS? NO GRACIAS

What should we think of the growing movement across the world to discourage mass tourism? On the Costa we have not yet arrived at situations like those of Barcelona, Venice or Phuket, but quite probably we will soon witness a conflict of interests between those who make their livings out of tourism, and the rest. The idea of introducing charges for visiting places will become increasingly controversial, and a conflict-free answer is not on the cards. It may sound drastic but the logical solution is to discourage, if not ban altogether, day trippers. This species arrives at their chosen destination in the morning, their pockets stuffed with what they have 'harvested' from the breakfast buffet, and they leave a few hours later to have a main meal where they came from. They even bring their mineral water so they don't have to buy anything at their destination. They make no economic contribution to the place they are visiting. In real terms they are freeloaders.

Although on the coast mass tourism probably affects us only when we find ourselves in a packed street, the 'cruisers' are the worst of all. Any given day a ship may arrive in Malaga with 5,000 passengers and the only beneficiaries are the port authorities. Thirty-five per cent of the cost of a cruise typically consists of the fees and taxes that the ships are charged for visiting a port. All passengers have their three meals a day guaranteed, so have no incentive to spend any money on food or drink while in port. In Malaga you will hear faint praise for what cruise passengers spend in restaurants, while those from elite passenger boats like The World are looking for gastronomic delights and are prepared to pay for them. These millionaires' ships offer no free lunches, so the passengers pay for their food and drink wherever they are. The problem is that small cruise boats only deliver a few hundred passengers into the grateful arms of Malaga's bars and restaurants, but at least that is better than the 5,000 that may arrive one morning on some 'queen of the seas' and spend next to nothing.

The Malaga Gastronomy Festival 2018 focuses on Basque cuisine

The festival this weekend is all about food, and Basque food in particular. It includes food trucks, wine and cheese tasting, workshops and cookery demonstrations

by DENISE BUSH

MALAGA. This year will be the fifth year of the Malaga Gastronomy Festival which is one of the biggest foodie events on the city's calendar. It started on Thursday and runs until Sunday 27 May with the main events taking place in the Plaza de la Marina. The popular food trucks are parked there, serving a variety of international foods from approximately midday onwards. The Plaza is also the site where cookery demonstrations are taking place.

Every year, the festival features a region of Spain and this year it is the turn of the Basque Country, a world famous foodie destination, and some top Basque chefs will be in Malaga for the festival.

The tastings will concentrate on wines and cheeses from the Basque region and there are also workshops demonstrating the diversity of the gastronomy in the area.

Several tasting sessions are held daily, giving visitors a chance to sample a wide range of cavas, vermouths and beers.

One of the show cooking activities last year. sur

Every day there are several cooking demonstrations, featuring mainly Basque dishes but also some traditional Andalusian recipes, Mexican, sushi and cake-making.

There are workshops on different ways of preparing tuna, making cocktails and pairing wines with foods.

Children can watch the winners of Junior Masterchef demonstrate their skills (Saturday, 12 noon) and there will be a contemporary dance performance by the Basque dance group, Aukeran DK (Saturday 6pm).

Music will be provided by various DJs and include reggae, songs of the 80s and a concert by the Free Soul Band (10pm tonight, 25 May). All the activities are free.

"Slimming diets tend to be very commercial and most of them have very little scientific basis"

Francisco Miralles Specialist and medical director of Asisa in Malaga

The doctor of Internal Medicine gave a talk on obesity as part of the 'Medac Talks' series in Malaga on Thursday

ÁNGEL ESCALERA

MALAGA. Excess weight has become a public health problem in western society. Francisco Miralles, a specialist in internal medicine (he sees patients at the Gálvez Clinic) and medical director of the Malaga branch of Asisa, spoke on Thursday about the factors which lead to obesity as part of the 'Medac Talks', organised by the Medac Institute in collaboration with SUR. The conference took place at the Medac offices, in Avenida de Velázquez. Dr Miralles says that many diets have very little scientific basis.

-Why are so many people becoming obese these days?

-There are several factors which can influence weight gain but which people don't often consider: genetics, sleep, social relationships, obesogens, microbiota (intestinal bacteria), inadequate meals and a sedentary lifestyle.

-Which has the greatest influence on weight gain, genetics or lifestyle habits?

-It has been shown that genetics are very important. Studies have been carried out on adopted children and have shown that between 30 and 60 per cent have a genetic conditioning which makes them resemble their biological parents. In monozygotic twins, who are genetically identical, the percentage is even higher. Although it is true that those twins share not only their genetics but also lifestyle habits: they eat the same foods and take a similar amount of exercise.

-Human beings seem to have passed from being accustomed to periods of hunger to eating in excess and not bothering with physical exercise.

-There is a clear obesogenic environment now. The genetic element is a conditioning factor, but not a determining one. We live in a society which tends towards obesity. People consume too many calories, are far too sedentary and there is a series of factors which result in us eating much more than we expend. Our forefathers didn't have those and, also, their work was much more physical.

-Of the subjects discussed at the conference, which do you think drew the most attention?

-I think probably the obesogens, which are chemical substances that work as metabolic disruptors. In other words, they intervene on the adipose tissue and increase the number of cells and their size. They also produce hormonal alterations and affect control of satiety and appetite. All that means that a person is more likely to put on weight. It's a vicious circle. The more obesogens you eat, the more fat you have, and the more fat you have, the more obesogens you store. These chemical substances are in things we use every day, like, for example, plastic water bottles.

Francisco Miralles. :: S. SALAS

-Is there any way the obesogens can be controlled medically?

-This is a very hot subject, and is something very recent. The authorities are just starting to legislate now. The Americans are very concerned about it.

-What relationship is there between plastic water bottles and increased obesity?

-The plastic releases obesogenic particles which dilute in the water. That's why they say plastic water bottles shouldn't be reused. Another recommendation is that foods should not be heated in a plastic container, always in glass. There are also obesogenic substances in herbicides and insecticides, which means that they pass into the food cycle. We end up eating them.

-Are diets effective in helping people to lose weight?

-People tend to go a bit crazy when it comes to diets. No matter what diet you follow, you will usually lose weight. What's important is to stick to the diet. We have the best diet in the world, which is the Mediterranean one. What is important is to continue with the diet and support it with physical exercise. There is a great deal of interest in different diets, but they are very commercial and most of them have little scientific basis.

-Most people believe they will lose weight if they diet, but they're not interested in taking exercise.

-Exercise by itself won't make you lose much weight, but it is important in maintaining weight loss. The essential thing is to change your behaviour and modify your way of eating and moving, because if you don't, even if you are on a strict diet, in a short time you will gain more weight than you lost.

-Do people ask for professional help when they want to lose weight?

-In general, no. Very few people ask a professional for advice. With social media and the internet it is easy to acquire information, but unfortunately a lot of that information is false. People tend to rely too much on the internet, and not enough on professionals.

Doctors María Isabel Pérez Cabeza and Ana Morales Becerra have passed a famously difficult paediatric ophthalmology and strabismus exam with flying colours

MÁLAGA. María Isabel Pérez Cabeza, 36, and Ana Morales Becerra, 31, are the only people in Spain to be able to add the letters FEBO after their names. They received the prestigious title Fellow of the European Board of Ophthalmology after passing an incredibly difficult subspecialist exam on the subjects of paediatric ophthalmology and strabismus.

This title, which has been awarded to just five European ophthalmologists, signifies international recognition of excellence and enables access to specialist jobs all over Europe.

"For us, passing the FEBO means we've overcome an important personal challenge. Very few ophthalmologists have this title. All the effort we put in to prepare for the test has paid off," María Isabel Pérez explained to SUR.

"The exam was very complex, with an integrated theory section of 375 questions and an oral section with four questions that lasted 15 minutes each. Everything was written and spoken in English," said Ana Morales.

The FEBO title is awarded by the European Board of Ophthalmology (EBO), the European Strabismology Association (ESA) and the European Paediatric Ophthalmological Society (EPOS). The examiners are all internationally recognised ophthalmologists and members of ESA or EPOS.

To be receive the title, ophthal-mologists must pass at least 70 per cent of the written test and 60 per cent of each oral test.

Despite the prestige of the FEBO title, it is not currently recognised within the jobs sector of the Andalusian region.

lusian Health Service (SAS) or the regional government. This is not the case elsewhere in Spain.

Specialists at Carlos Haya

Ana Isabel Pérez Cabeza and Ana Morales both specialised in ophthalmology at Carlos Haya regional hospital. The former completed her residency in 2010 and the latter in 2015.

Dr Pérez Cabeza works in the paediatric ophthalmology unit at the Malaga children's hospital on a temporary contract. At the same time, she is a consultant ophthalmologist at a private clinic in Ronda, her birth town.

For her part, Dr Morales works in the regional hospital of Motril in a 50 per cent job share with another ophthalmologist. Before that, she practised paediatric ophthalmology for two years at the San Joan de Deu Hospital in Barcelona. When she finished her job there, she was offered an extension to her contract, but turned it down in favour of returning to Malaga. Ana Morales also sees patients at a private clinic.

These two local ophthalmologists are looking to secure professional careers within the Andalusian health service. Ana Isabel Pérez is satisfied with her current temporary contract at the children's hospital and Ana Morales hopes that the SAS will offer her a contract at the same hospital in the near future. It's safe to say that the FEBO title is a reliable guarantee of the capability and knowledge of both these women.

100 people expected to take part in Yoga for Cudeca

:: M. HAY

MALAGA. An open-air yoga class will take place at the Arroyo de la Miel Polideportivo's Gym on Saturday 26 May, in aid of Cudeca care charity. The class is open to the public and will be taught on the grass pitch of the Benalmádena gym. Around 100 people are expected to participate.

The town's councillor for Sports, Joaquín Villazón, was joined by the gym's manager, Eloy Diaz Rio-Miranda, yoga teacher Marta Rubio Castejón and Cudeca representative Natalia Aparicio to officially unveil Yoga for Cudeca on Monday 21. The councillor praised the event, saying "not only is yoga a healthy activity but this event is for a very good cause as well."

Rubio was keen to point out that the class is open to all abilities: "It won't be too complicated. The style of yoga is not important. We'll be working on connecting our hearts."

Every year, Cudeca provides care and support, free of charge, to more than 1,400 people that have cancer or incurable illnesses and to their families.

The event will take place at 10am and tickets are 5 euros, with all proceeds going to Cudeca. Participants can register at the gym's reception up until the day of the event and are asked to bring their own mat if possible.

"We'll be able to predict Parkinson's and Alzheimer's before symptoms appear"

Pedro González Alegre Director of the Neurogenetics Programme in Pennsylvania

A former student at the Faculty of Medicine in Malaga, he is now the head of one of the most prestigious research centres in the USA

MALAGA. Dr Pedro González Alegre normally comes home to Malaga for his summer holidays, but his most recent visit was to go back to his old faculty, invited by the Biomedicine, Translational Research and New Technologies in Health programme to give a series of lectures to students and lecturers. He obtained his doctorate in Neurosciences at Malaga, but moved to the United States to do his residency, and stayed. He has worked at several US universities, and since 2015 has been the chief director of the Neurogenetics programme, a new centre of translational excellence of the Neurology department of Pennsylvania university.

—Are we about to see a revolution in the treatment of neurodegenerative illnesses?

—This is an area which has changed greatly in recent years. What happens is that, because of the peculiarities of the nervous system and the obstacles it presents for the application of molecular and genetic therapies, the advances take longer.

—How do you see the future?

—In the next decade we are going to see a total change in the availability of genetic and molecular therapies, within and outside the nervous system. There will be new challenges, such as who they are given to and how they will be paid for, but that is another debate. What is certain is that they will be available.

—At Pennsylvania university you directed a research centre on Huntington Disease and now you are focusing on Parkinson's. What is the difference between them?

—Huntington is an illness with a known genetic base, but Parkinson's is a heterogeneous illness with numerous factors involved. One of them is genetic, and that is the part we are studying. We are looking at special populations, such as people who develop Parkinson's at an early age, where there is a clear genetic component. We have also found populations of Jews in north Africa, of whom a higher percentage than usual develop this illness. It's what we call personalised medicine, focusing on individuals or very specific groups.

—There is concern among society about Alzheimer's, which is precisely what you are also research- ing now.

—Yes; it is worrying because some very promising clinical tests have been carried out, but they haven't produced results. That's why we are asking ourselves what the problem is; why aren't we understanding this illness? And we still don't know the answer.

—And what is your opinion?

—From my point of view all these illnesses, until now, have been treated very late. The key is going to be treating them long before the symptoms appear. Strategies are being developed in order to be able to predict Parkinson's and Alzheimer's before they start to show. Many of the clinical tests at the moment are going in that direction. It's impressive how many genetic and molecular studies are being carried out, and it would be very strange for none of them to produce positive results. However, they are expensive studies, which need a great deal of financing and time for the results to be seen.

—You have encouraged medical students at Malaga university to go abroad to do research and specialise. Do you think that's essential?

—It's not essential, but mobility is beneficial. They don't have to go to another country; it can be elsewhere in Spain. But yes, moving away from your environment is beneficial. You learn other systems, you are with people who think differently and in that sense the further you go the more different their way of thinking and way of life will be. More than changing country, it is a change of mentality.

—Is that why you went to the US originally, and then worked in different universities?

—Yes, I've always liked changing where I live and even what I do, because I like doing new things and it's very satisfying.

—You're currently back, visiting the faculty where you studied; what percentage of your professional success would you attribute to this faculty and university?

—A great deal. Not just for what they taught me, but above all for the example they gave me with regard to the future. This is where I started in research. I have good memories of my time here; the training was excellent, especially for such a young faculty and university. A large part of what I have been able to do is due to my training and the encouragement the faculty gave me.

—What are the main differences between the American and Spanish educational systems?

—The model is a little different, although the standard of training is comparable. The biggest difference is that in the USA students end up with a large debt because the training is expensive. In terms of studies, the basic science and clinical practice form part of the training much earlier than here.

—Do the professors have the same dedication as those here?

—I couldn't work in the conditions my colleagues in Malaga do. The focus on teaching means you can't do other things. It's admirable how they can do good research, despite the teaching workload. In the US the classes are only a small part of it. I teach about what I do clinically, while others focus more on teaching, or some teach in the laboratory or the hospital. I believe teachers need to be protected and given more time for research.

—Many Spanish graduates are moving to other countries because of a lack of opportunities for them here. What do you think about that?

—When you leave your country because you want to, because you like the idea of doing research in other places or laboratories, to grow professionally, I think it's fantastic. But having to pack your bags and move abroad because there are no opportunities in your own country is another matter. A lot of money is invested in training a doctor, or any other professional, and it's a shame if they can't stay here and work.

Ricky Lavazza at the Sunset Beach Club.

Charity performance

BENALMÁDENA. On Saturday, 26 May, Sunset Beach Club hotel in Benalmádena will be hosting a Charity Concert “Night at the Movies” in aid of three children’s charities.

An evening of fabulous music will be presented by one of the coast’s most popular entertainers (and Sunset Beach Club resident performer), Ricky Lavazza with special guest, Karen Danzig. The show will close with a tribute to the film The Full Monty.

The aim of the event is to raise funds for three children’s charities which the hotel has been supporting for the last four years as part of its ‘Sunset Breaks’ initiative. At a similar event last year, they raised over 12,000 euros and are hoping to surpass this figure this year.

The charities supported are Make-A-Wish® Spain, Barretstown (a camp that provides residential programmes for children with cancer and other serious illnesses), and Debra Spain (children with EB, a condition which makes skin very fragile).

There will also be a raffle with prizes which will include four star hotel accommodation, return flights to the UK courtesy of Jet 2, golf green fees, meals for two, a luxury GHD hair styling item, and many more.

Tickets are 10 euros and can be purchased at the Sunset Beach Club Leisure Desk (Open Sunday to Friday from 10am to 6 pm) or call Joanne: 695 887 366. All the money from ticket sales will go to the charities.

Doors to the Moonlight Bar open at 8pm for a 9pm start.

and origami will be offered.

Food trucks will offer traditional Cuban, Mexican, Japanese and American style fast-food, while the main stage will host some of the coast’s top musicians. Friday’s concerts include legendary bluesman, Richard Ray Farrell, followed by a performance of the coast’s top ska band, Mentally Ska’d. On Saturday, the music will continue with rumba-funk group, Mitad Doble; and the reggae-rock band, Clusterfucks.

The event, held in the gardens of the Pablo Ruiz Picasso Cultural Centre, begins at 5pm and ends at midnight on Friday 25 (today). On Saturday, the festival will start at midday and finish at midnight. www.torremolinos.es

Spanish Print Museum presents Viola as both man and artist

The 'Casidas' series :: JOSELE-LANZA

The Spanish Print Museum presents its first monographic exhibition of graphic art and painting by Manuel Viola in Marbella

:: NIEVES CASTRO

MARBELLA. To coincide with the 102nd anniversary of his birth in Zaragoza, the Spanish Print Museum opened the doors to its first single-subject exhibition of the work of Manuel Viola on 18 May.

The vast exhibition, which is available to the public until 7 July, occupies almost every room in the Marbella art gallery, to display the creative genius of one of the most popular members of the legendary El Paso group.

Visitors will have the chance to view photographs and other original documents whilst learning little-known details about the artist's life.

The show is curated by Javier La-cruz Mavas, the author of 'Manuel Viola. Entre la luz y la tenebra' [Between the light and the shadows], one of the most comprehensive studies of the artist to date.

Rafael Canogar, cofounder of El Paso and patron of the Spanish Print Museum, has also been fundamental in the creation of this exhibition. The artist lent a folder of lithography from El Paso to the gallery, which contains work from Canogar himself, Martín Chirino, Manuel Millares, Manuel Rivera, Antonio Saura and Viola.

Also interesting is the contribution from the Cultural Consortium for Goya, Fuendetodos. The organisation in Zaragoza has lent some early tests from the 'Casidas', a lithography series by Viola which pays homage to Federico García Lorca.

'La Saeta' will be displayed. The painting, which was significant in the informalism movement, determined Viola's acceptance into the El Paso group - the most important visual arts collective of the second half of the 20th Century - and was what helped Manuel Viola become recognised as one of the greats.

This ambitious exhibition also dedicates some wall space to the time before Viola became an artist, when he was more a poet than a painter and lived in France after being exiled in the wake of the Spanish civil war.

The show will have a small section which aims to throw light upon the man behind the artist. Texts and graphic documentation will reveal, for example, his passion for flamenco and a fondness for pseudonyms.

Germán Borrecherro, executive director of the gallery says that he felt it important to include some reference material about Viola's adventurous life.

The exhibition, which was launched on International Museum Day, is altogether a beautiful homage to one of the main protagonists in the renovation of Spanish art after the war.

Journey duration: 3

Festivals: 4 horas.

Visits to wine cellars and museums: 6 hours.

Other visits: 5 hours.

Fun, tradition and sherry. The three main ingredients of the festival which begins next Tuesday in the Cadiz town of Sanlúcar de Barrameda.

Named after a type of dry sherry, the Feria de la Manzanilla takes place at the turn of the month, so visitors can enjoy the warm, summery breeze that is common during late spring in Andalucía.

The festival ground will be adorned with more than 24,000 lanterns and will play host to 70 stalls. Celebrations take place day and night and attendees can experience typical local food and live music.

Although the Sanlúcar cuisine is known to be rich and varied, the foods of focus next week will be the area's most famous products, like prawns and shrimp tortillas. The seafood combines beautifully with manzanilla sherry, produced in eight different bodegas, all of which are known for providing high quality products to the people of Cadiz.

Though Sanlúcar is part of the network of Marco de Jerez vineyards, the municipality also makes its own special manzanilla sherry, which is exclusive to local bodegas. During festival time, the area will also open the doors of bodegas, where visitors can get to know the delicious sherry as well as a variety of wines.

From a historical tourism perspective, it is worth remembering that Sanlúcar, located at the mouth of the Guadalquivir river, was an important lookout point for incoming invasions. For this reason, the city has a complex fort system, made up of the Castillos de Espíritu Santo (since disappeared), the San Salvador fort at the port of Bonanza (partly covered by dunes) and the Castillo de Santiago, situated in the highest part of the city. This site is both significant and incredibly unique; an essential visiting point for tourists.

Sanlúcar is equally as pleasant in summer as in spring. In fact, during summertime, yet more events pull tourists to the area, such as the famous horse races on the beach, which take place in August.

"It will be a difficult game but we're well prepared"

Malaga's English full-back Shiv previews Sunday's battle for promotion

A spot in the Women's first division will be secured if Malaga can avoid defeat against Femarguín at the weekend

by CARLOS J. MARTÍNEZ

MALAGA. Sunday could be a historic day for Malaga Femenino as a win or a draw against Femarguín could seal their promotion to the first division. The squad, after a week's break (because they are part of a three-team mini league fighting for one promotion spot) now has an opportunity to put the cherry on top of what has been a fantastic season.

It will not be easy, though. Their opponents could still achieve promotion themselves and a win would give them every chance of reaching a long-held objective for a number of teams in what has been a very competitive second tier.

For their part, Malaga made a number of strategic signings in winter with an eye on this play-off phase, having already run away with their league group. One of the new faces was Siobhan 'Shiv' Marie Wilson, who arrived from Georgia State University in the US university league. "The atmosphere in the dressing room is fantastic. We have a lot of confidence and we are training very hard. It's now down to the last two games to achieve our goal for the season - promotion," said the full-back who is now a mainstay in the side, having taken her first steps in football with Tottenham Ladies.

She then moved to America, representing Hutchinson Community College (where she was named best wide player of the year), Clayton State University (where she won the award again) and Georgia State University.

Adaptation

"I was playing in America but when the offer to join Malaga came in, it was a no-brainer," said Shiv, who also said that Mery was a deciding factor in the move. "We [Shiv and Mery] used to play together in the US and she has helped me a lot with adapting. Since I joined the team halfway through the season, things have moved on quite well for me on a personal level. What's more, the team is having a good year and we are very close to our target," she said.

Things were not all rosy during her first few weeks at the club as Shiv's grasp of Spanish was not the best. "The beginning was very difficult because of the language but, after five months in the city, things are a lot easier and I understand Spanish a bit better now," she said, adding: "I love Malaga and the weather; it's better than in England where it rains every day."

The switch from the USA to Spain was not only difficult on a personal level, but also on the pitch where Shiv had to make some adaptations to her style of play: "In both the US and in England, the two countries where I've played, football is much more physical than tactical. In Spain, tactics come first and I prefer it that way."

"The last time I played in England I was 18. There they let fouls go but here the referee always blows for them. That is something I am getting used to little by little."

The big game

With Sunday in mind, Shiv didn't want to tempt fate too much, though she did stress the potential in the squad. "If we win or draw in Femarguín we'll be in the first division. We know that it is going to be a very difficult game, but we're prepared. The coach has a thorough strategy prepared for the game," she said.

The English defender also wanted to highlight the support of the travelling fans so far: "The 'malagistas' that travelled to Alicante were incredible. They made a lot more noise than the SPA supporters," she said.

Marbella in need of a big turnaround to keep promotion dream alive

Two goals in quick succession means the Costa side must deliver when the teams meet again on Sunday

by OPTA

VIGO. If they are to maintain any hope of promotion to Segunda, Marbella will have to overturn a two-goal deficit after defeat in Galicia in the first leg of the first play-off round against Celta B on Sunday.

Two goals in quick succession in the first half condemned the Costa side, despite them maintaining possession for much of the second 45.

Celta B, with Brais Méndez back in the side after his spell with the first team in La Liga, had the early chances. Méndez himself tried his luck from distance but his effort whistled just wide of the post, moments after Wilfred in the Marbella goal pulled off a remarkable save from a ferocious ball across goal by Eckert.

After just 14 minutes, the hosts had the breakthrough as Drazic converted Álex Serrano's corner at the far post.

Just three minutes later, it was two. Juan Hernández beat Carlos Julio to the ball to slot home Kevin's cross.

Marbella, however, fought back but Sotres was equal to Corpas' double strike inside the area.

Visiting captain Añón also came close; his strike from range only narrowly missed the target.

The hosts kept up this pressure in the second half but couldn't claw a goal back. Catena had the best chance but his header was cleared off the line by Kevin.

Substitute Chus Hevia also came within a whisker but with his side piling on the pressure, they were ultimately grateful to Wilfred that it wasn't 3-0.

The second leg will take place at the Municipal stadium in Marbella on Sunday. Kick off is at noon.

A sad end to Malaga's golden era

Malaga's ten-year stay in La Liga came to a disappointing end on Saturday, bowing out with defeat to Getafe on the field and with protests off it

✉ english@diariosur.es

MALAGA. With relegation already long-since predetermined, the Malaga team had little to play for in Saturday's match, the final of the season against Getafe - and it showed.

The few fans that were in attendance slumped in their seats, their numbers reduced as a result of the protest that was taking place outside. The target of the ire, Malaga's controversial owner Sheikh Abdullah Al-Thani was nowhere to be seen as the blue-and-white-striped funeral procession marched up to the ground from the central Plaza de la Constitución.

Once things got under way, the game trudged ahead at a decidedly slow pace. It wasn't until eighteen minutes in when Malaga had the ball close to the Getafe goal when Youssef En-Nesyri dispossessed the defender and laid the ball off to Lestienne who, with a clear sight of goal, let his opportunity go to waste as the defender got back to clear.

This chance did rouse the crowd a little and their rallying was rewarded with a few minutes of end-to-end action. First, Diego Rolán was played into the inside left position, but the Uruguayan couldn't squeeze the ball past Vicente Guaita.

Adrián then sent the Getafe keeper scrambling with his volley from the edge of the area which was blocked out for a corner.

Getafe's Amath Ndiaye, who caused Malaga's makeshift backline no end of trouble, came close with a scuffed left-footed shot that dragged just wide of the far post.

Malaga keeper Andrés Prieto, playing his third successive game, had to be sharp before the end of the first half to palm away a stinging freekick from Vitorino Antunes.

Following the break, the expectation was for those protesting to flood in to the stadium to watch the second half. Up until then, the seating in the 'grada de animación' was all-but empty. The protesters' eventual arrival was more of a trickle than a flood, but the additions to the crowd managed to sustain a few chants, lighting a spark in the previously sombre stadium.

The stadium was especially animated by the angry calls of "¡Al-Thani vete ya!" (Al-Thani out now!). Chanters also urged sporting director Mario Husillos to leave, with an agreement over the termination of his contract still not yet reached.

The hosts created a few chances in the early phases on the second half. A nice team move, which saw Isaac Success play in Rolán, ended in the same way as the forward's chance in the first half; Guaita got down well to smother the shot.

"My conscience is clear" - José González

In his farewell press conference at La Rosaleda, outgoing head coach José González had his head held high. He said: "We have given all we had and for that reason my conscience, as that of most of the players, is clear."

González also made it clear that he felt Malaga belonged in La Liga and conceded that getting out of Segunda would be "very complicated".

"When you come into the season with Rolán as your highest scorer with nine [from the previous year] and the second one, penalties aside, with two... you're going to have problems. If we had more goal scorers in the team, things would have worked out differently," he concluded.

Success, who put in his best performance in a Malaga shirt, then skipped past three defenders to put himself through on the keeper. However, instead of going for goal himself, his lay-off for Maxime Lestienne was too heavy, forcing the Belgian wide and he could only hook the ball into the side netting.

The deadlock was broken in the 73rd minute when Loïc Rémy was upended in the area by Diego González and the former Chelsea forward brushed himself down and slotted the ball in, sending Prieto the wrong way.

This subdued the atmosphere even further. It could have taken a further dent in stoppage time but Rémy whipped his shot wide of the far post, sparing the Malaga fans further embarrassment.

As time was called, the contrast between the two team couldn't have been more apparent. High-flying Getafe waved to their twenty or so delighted fans while Malaga fans and players alike plodded out of the door, heads down, contemplating their sorry season and the club's future in Segunda.

José González was head coach for the second half of the season. :: FERNANDO GONZÁLEZ

A record-breaking season for all the wrong reasons

Malaga had the lowest points tally across all of the major leagues, scoring in just 15 of their league games

:: PEDRO LUIS ALONSO

MALAGA. The Malaga squad have gone on their holidays after a campaign in which they picked up just 20 points, less than half of the total which normally guarantees safety in La Liga. While last year 32 would have been enough, this time round that total was 44, with Leganés in 17th picking up 43. This agonising season for the Blue and Whites can be summarised by some rather startling statistics.

Malaga's worst top-flight campaign in history

Out of Malaga's 37 seasons in the first division (17 in the current format), 2017-18 was the worst in history. Until now, the 2005-06 campaign was the worst on record when the team finished on 24 points after picking up just a single win (on Manolo Hierro's debut in the dugout against Athletic) in the entirety of the second half of the season.

Despite this abysmal run, the first half of the season was more or less as expected; this time the level was terrible from start to finish. Only for a brief period between match days 10 and 15 did Malaga ever look like a team capable of competing, picking up three victories and a draw in six games.

The worst in the top leagues

If we take a look at the top leagues across Europe, it doesn't make favourable reading for Malaga. For the most part, Malaga had the consolation that Serie A newcomers Benevento were worse-performing, but in the end the Italians finished on 21 points - one more than the Costa team.

In England, bottom team West Bromwich Albion finished on 31, Köln in Germany had 22 (despite playing four games fewer), and Metz in Ligue 1 reached 26.

17 defeats by a single goal

One of the most remarkable numbers from the season was the margin of the defeats suffered. Despite finishing rock bottom, the side lost 17 times by a single goal - a La Liga record - while they only suffered two thrashings (5-0 at the Mestalla and the 4-1 at Espanyol). You could also include the 3-0 against Alavés, with the latter two results coming in the final furlong with relegation already confirmed.

23 games without scoring

One of the worst characteristics of this side has been the inability to find the back of the net. On many occasions this was down to inability to create chances, but not always. Out of the 38 games, Malaga failed to score in 23 of them - over 60 per cent of fixtures.

The third worst in 20 years

During the past 20 years of La Liga there have only been two teams worse than Malaga - Cordoba (2014-15) and Granada (2016-17). All three teams registered 20 points but Malaga's goal difference (-37) keeps them above their Andalusian rivals who had -46 and -52, respectively.

Only Sporting Gijón in 1997-98 (13 points) performed worse.

The second most defeats

The Boquerones finished the season with the second most defeats in La Liga history with 28. Only the aforementioned Sporting, with 29, exceeded that number.

A top scorer with five goals

Having only scored 24 goals, it comes as no surprise that the top scorer for the club only registered five. That was Diego Rolan, followed closely by Chory Castro and En-Nesyri, with four apiece.

37 players fielded

Given the eight new recruits in January, along with numerous exits and bad results, Malaga fielded a total of 37, the final two on Saturday: Álex Robles and Juan Cruz.

No respite in the Copa either

In addition to the horrendous league campaign, Malaga added yet another failure in the Copa del Rey. The side were eliminated for the third consecutive year in the first round to a second division team. On this occasion it was against Numancia (2-1 in Soria and 1-1 at La Rosaleda); the previous two were against Mirandés and Córdoba, respectively.

Though Malaga were giving priority to the league and players were rotated, there has not been a worse-performing team in the cup in the last three years.

Muñiz awaiting assurances before taking on Malaga job

The Asturian has been offered a two-year deal as both head coach and sporting director, but first he wants guarantees from the sheikh

MALAGA. The future of Malaga CF is set to be decided this week after club lawyer Joaquín Jofre flew out to Doha to meet with club owner Sheikh Abdullah Al-Thani on Monday to discuss the two most pressing issues affecting the club: the appointment of a new head coach and the departure of sporting director Mario Husillos.

As SUR in English reported last week, Husillos will be leaving his role after having seen his authority publicly undermined by Al-Thani, who closed the door on Lucas Alcaraz's appointment as head coach via Twitter.

After discussions with Jofre and senior consultants Antonio Benítez, Ben Barek and Francisco Martín Aguilar, Al-Thani has decided to do away with the sporting director role and appoint one man to carry out all sporting operations.

The man Al-Thani has chosen is Juan Ramón Muñiz, who turned down the job as head coach after a meeting with Husillos months ago (citing a desire to have greater influence within the club and concerns over the influence of Al-Thani in day-to-day matters). However, now that the role on offer has changed, the two-time Malaga boss' interest has been rekindled.

It is understood that Muñiz has been offered a two-year deal to carry out the roles of head coach and sporting director, but will not accept the deal on the table until he gets it in writing from Al-Thani that he will have the full confidence of the club to bring in an extensive backroom staff to drive the new sporting project and that there will be no interference on Al-Thani's part.

This proposal is what is under discussion in Qatar at the moment. If the sheikh agrees to the terms set out by Muñiz, his appointment will be announced as soon as possible so he can start to play catch-up on Malaga's rivals in Segunda who have already started planning for next season while the Costa team has been in paralysis. However, if refused, Malaga will be back at square one and need to find a coach willing to fit the bill.

ANTONIO GÓNGORA

Sealing Husillos' departure

The second issue that needs resolving is that of Husillos' departure. Since informing the club that he would be leaving last week, he has continued to turn up at the Malaga offices but has decided against pursuing any of the deals that he had instigated so as not to step on the toes of the incoming man to take his role.

Negotiations to sign Muñiz are believed to be progressing well, but even should the sheikh sign off on his demands, he cannot come in until Husillos' future is resolved.

Having seen his working conditions compromised, and therefore the terms of his contract verbally agreed with the sheikh's sons, Nayef and Nasser, before re-joining last winter broken, the sporting director is holding out for a payoff.

Until then, and until Jofre returns from Qatar later this week, the whole process remains at a standstill and Malaga continue to lose ground on their rivals.

Muñiz and his agent are in constant dialogue with Malaga as they await the sheikh's approval. :: SUR

Atlético Malagueño with all to play for in second leg

EMILIO ROSALES

MALAGA. Malaga's reserve team, Atlético Malagueño, have their promotion dream still intact after drawing 0-0 with Yeclano in their opening game of first play-off round for promotion to Segunda B on Sunday afternoon.

The side from Murcia travelled to the Costa and showed their experience, disrupting Malagueños' play and setting themselves out to be hard to break down.

It will be a different prospect in the return leg on Sunday when Yeclano will have to open up in an attempt to get the go-ahead goal; a tactic Malaga reserves, run-away winners of their group in Tercera, hope will backfire.

The game at La Constitución stadium, a stadium with a capacity of 4,000 and with the stands very close to the pitch, kicks off at 6.45pm. Tickets are available for between five and 15 euros.

A LOOK AT LA LIGA

A clash of the titans

Back at the start of the season I had a premonition that it would be a Real-Liverpool final, but I do fear for the Reds...

The Liverpool squad was in Marbella last week. :: EFE

I hate predictions but sometimes I get these premonitions. When asked by Liverpool FC's in-house TV station who would reach the final of the Champions League this season, it came to me in a flash. "It will be Real Madrid v Liverpool," I said.

The way things have worked out, the surname Palmer must go back to the ability to read the future by looking at the wrinkles on some unsuspecting punter's hand at a Hull fairground!

And so, every time I've made a guest appearance on LFCTV I've reminded them how they politely laughed at my suggestion - they must have thought I was just being courteous.

I stick by my reasoning. Real Madrid is a team built to win the elite European trophy. Big-game players who don't necessarily turn up every week... but give them an occasion and their chests burst.

Liverpool have a side who would have been underestimated by so many but they have grown with every month of the season. Even losing Philippe Coutinho couldn't harm their momentum. I've argued countless times that Mo Salah, Roberto Firmino and Sadio Mané is the best front three in club football this season; contrast that to the once great BBC - not the world-renowned broadcasters but the world-renowned forward line.

Karim Benzema, Gareth Bale and Cristiano Ronaldo have only started FIVE out of Real Madrid's SIXTY games this season; and only gone ninety minutes together once. This underlines how fragmented Real Madrid's squad has been.

Nonetheless, when the mid-week Champions League games come, the squad thrives under the floodlights and they have lived up to the expectation that they will reach the final. Again.

One conductor on the train thanked me for the tip. He put £3 on at odds of 120-1 and it has paid for his ticket to Kiev. Strangely, though, no one on Merseyside has asked for my final prediction...

Speaking to a couple of Anfield greats last week, they privately aired concerns that the players may have exhausted themselves running the marathon that is the Premier League. Hopefully the air of the Costa del Sol has restorative powers.

In contrast, Real have been cantering for several weeks and Zinedine Zidane has been able to use Liga matches as training exercises to merely sharpen his players.

I suspect Liverpool will get off to a flyer; and Real do have a habit of conceding early goals. Madrid also have the reserves of energy and talent to gather momentum and peak later in matches. They have a history of overpowering opposition in the final stages. If Liverpool lose impetus I fear it could be a heavy defeat. Five-one springs to mind.

But oh... wait on... The spirits are giving me a name... Danny Ings. Watch this space.

Isco, only the third player from Malaga to go to a World Cup province in history to go to a World Cup.

He follows in the footsteps of Juanito (Argentina 78 and Spain 82), who scored a penalty in the latter, and Fernando Hierro, who played in every World Cup between 1990 and 2002.

The taste of a historic success

Asisa Alhaurín de la Torre, who a few months ago were struggling to find enough players for training sessions, have now been promoted to the second division

FERNANDO MORGADO

Twitter: @fernandmorgado

MALAGA. Everybody agrees that this season has been "difficult". Maybe that's why the victory achieved last weekend at Los Guindos tasted extra good for the president, trainer and players of Asisa Alhaurín de la Torre. At Christmas, Francis Trujillo found himself with only four or five players in some training sessions, which made it very complicated to prepare for competition. Now, the team has made history by earning promotion to Liga Femenina 2, the national basketball second division, after three wins out of three in the playoffs - the last against Náutico Tenerife, 48-68, on Sunday. It is years since any club from Malaga has reached this level.

After the third match, the Asisa players watched a replay on a giant screen in the pavilion. Many, like Elisabet Iborra, still couldn't believe that they had beaten the favourites on Saturday.

"We knew Adareva was a very strong and physically superior team, but we put our hearts into it. Next year will be very important and there will have to be changes, but we're ready to take on whatever comes at us," she said.

The captain, Lorena Liñán, celebrated the victory with mixed emotions, because she is not sure if she will be continuing. "My personal situation is complicated and I don't know if I can carry on. It's such a shame that this has only happened now, when I'm 35, but that's the way it goes. At last we have a second-division team in Malaga, and it would be good if other Malaga players joined the team. There are a lot of very good players out there," she said.

Part of the success was due to Trujillo, who had to solve numerous difficulties to maintain the level of the team. "It has been the most complicated season of my life, and I have been a coach for 25 years. Injuries and personal circumstances meant we were often training with very few players. At Christmas it looked as if this ship was sinking," explained

Trujillo. It didn't sink, though, thanks to American player Jay White joining the team in February. "She made all the difference. The team got their confidence back. The ones who were about to abandon ship decided to stay on, and that made us stronger."

A surprise win for Unicaja against Adareva on Sunday

Unicaja brought joy to their fans at home on Sunday morning by beating Adareva de Tenerife 60-50. The team from the Canaries, which in theory were superior, hadn't recovered from their shock defeat to Alhaurín on Saturday and were not at their best. Also, the Malaga women played as intensively as always and, with huge support from the public, held a defensive and high-pressure position throughout the game. The first quarter went to Adareva (13-15), but Unicaja came back in the second thanks to Lucía Hernández and moved ahead before the break (29-25). The Adareva players improved their game in the third quarter, but in the final they deflated and Unicaja, led by Marta Ortega, reached victory by 20 to 10. Lorena Aranda's pupils ended the promotion phase in second place, which was excellent for a team formed just nine months ago.

Sandra Pérez with the ball. :: F. G.

Now it is time to think about the next season. The demands of the sport and financial situation mean some changes are needed. The club's main sponsor, Asisa, and the local council will continue to give their support. Club president Juan Pedro Parra says that "Our only strategy is to use common sense, as we have done until now, and look after our fans, who are really important to us," he says.

He would also like Francis Trujillo to continue: "If he wants to, he'll be staying with us. He deserves the credit for all this," he says. Trujillo, however, isn't sure. He admits he needs time to consider, after such a difficult season.

THE SEVEN DIFFERENCES

THE STARS

Aquarius
January 21 - February 19
Avoid gossip this week even though a juicy secret comes your way. You may not realise how sensitive it is.

Pisces
February 20th - March 20th
Although you may be looking for bargains at the weekend, are these things you really need?

Aries
March 21st - April 20th
Relatives bring a welcome surprise at the weekend. This brings romantic overtones.

Taurus
April 21st - May 21st
Optimism soars as a bit of good luck at the beginning of the week carries on. There is money to be saved and bargains to be had.

Gemini
May 22nd - June 21st
Be aware of any sudden bills coming your way and plan ahead. There are bargains to be had, so have patience.

Cancer
June 22nd - July 23rd
If you are moving home or making changes in this area, give your imagination free flight.

Leo
July 24th - August 23rd
Don't panic if things are happening quickly in your emotional life. Taking a practical approach keeps you calm.

Virgo
August 24th - September 23rd
Don't wait until the last minute to pay bills or get money organised. Things can happen quickly.

Libra
September 24th - October 23rd
Some kind of insurance or pension needs your attention. Avoid being vague. Get the details loud and clear. Homework needed? Yes!

Scorpio
October 24th - November 22nd
A fresh start on the home front could see you turning out cupboards and flinging out junk.

Sagittarius
November 23rd - December 21st
Look at how your talents can best be used both at work and in the home. Someone is inspiring you.

Capricorn
December 22nd - January 20th
Get any health check-ups for yourself or family before this really busy summer ahead. Give yourself some pampering.

ANSWERS

Quiz answers

Answer 1: Web browsers
Of interest: They are all software applications for accessing information on the World Wide Web.
Of interest: Apple launched the iMac G3 in 1998. The lower case 'i' originally stood for 'internet'. Steve Jobs expanded the meaning to include individual, instruct, inform and inspire.

BOOK OF THE WEEK

The Reign in Spain
W. Kristjan Arnold

This book examines Spain’s turbulent 20th century, a period of political upheaval marked by civil war and multiple regime changes. Throughout the turmoil, one constant has been the Spanish Monarchy. This book offers insights on how the Bourbon Dynasty survived Republics, Franco’s Dictatorship, assassinations, coups, and a myriad of other adverse obstacles. It is a tale of power and perseverance and the Royal family’s struggle to deliver democracy to a nation starved for freedom and human rights.

THOUGHT FOR THE WEEK

Yesterday is history, tomorrow is a mystery and today is a gift

An international flavour in Manilva

Organisers are celebrating after a larger-than-expected turnout at this year's international day

:: ASH BOLTON

MANILVA. Thousands of people descended on the Castillo de la Duquesa for Manilva's annual International Day last Saturday.

The family festival saw 25 different nationalities put up colourful stands around the historic castle to showcase the best their country had to offer.

During the event scores of singers and dancers took to the stage including English singer Rachael Hawnt - who recently performed in the BBC's TV show All Together Now.

Dean Shelton, 44, councillor of Foreign Affairs at Manilva council, told SUR in English: "We literally had thousands of people turning up throughout the day. The numbers were up massively on last year. So much so we are thinking of doing two days next year.

"It's basically an international day on a much smaller scale than the Pueblos international festival in Fuen-girola. It gives nationalities around Manilva the opportunity to present their customs, dress, sports, food and their flag to the local community here."

Dean said they had stands from countries including: Brazil, Ukraine, the United States, Russia, England, Ireland, Cuba, Argentina, Peru, Uruguay, Paraguay, Morocco, Thailand, Bangladesh and Spain.

Organised by the Foreign Residents Department in Manilva, the event is designed to bring the various communities living in the town together.

Dean explained: "It's about integration, that's what we are trying to do. It's an event where different cultures get to present their country. It's about making foreign nationalities welcome here in Manilva."

Manilva, which includes the Puerto de la Duquesa, Sabinillas and Castillo de la Duquesa, has some 16,000 residents, of which 42 per cent are foreigners.

Dean added: "It was the biggest and most successful International Day we've had in Manilva to date. We are extremely happy with how it went."
