Go-ahead given for Britons to swap to Spanish driving licences

Those UK residents who have been stopped from driving since last May can finally get on the road again

The Spanish Cabinet gave the green light this week to the new process for British drivers who spend more than six months in Spain to swap their UK permit to a Spanish one without being forced to take a theory exam and practical driving test. The long-awaited deal had been done for a few weeks but was waiting the all-important ministers' rubber stamp.

Those British licence holders who recently came to live or missed the pre-Brexit easier swap deadline can now apply to the DGT for their Spanish licence. They can use their UK licence for six months again while they do so. P3

Over 20 per cent of self-employed workers in Malaga province are not Spanish

The strength of tourism and the presence of technology companies are partly why so many people in the province are so-called 'autónomos'

CRISTINA VALLEJO

MÁLAGA. Malaga is the province of Andalucía which has the highest number of self-employed workers. The latest figures from the Social Security authorities show that 83,132 people in the province are registered as 'autónomo', and that is considerably more than in Seville province, where there are fewer than 75,000.

Nor does Malaga only stand out for the number of self-employed workers, but also for how this has grown in recent years. The work ministry website, which has data going back to 2016, shows that between that year and the third quarter of 2022 the number rose by almost 16 per cent, whereas in Andalucía as a whole the increase was just over nine per cent and in Spain less than three per cent.

Why is there this difference? José Luis Perea, who is head of the self-employed workers association (ATA), says there is a certain entrepreneurial spirit in Malaga, especially on the Costa del Sol, and it is structural in nature rather than not cyclical.

He also says measures introduced by the Andalusian government to reduce social security payments for the newly self-employed have encouraged people to start working for themselves, and the strength of Malaga's tourism sector is another important factor, because the sheer number of visitors to the area provides numerous opportunities for people to set up in business on their own in order to provide services for them.

In fact, it is noticeable that 80 per cent of workers in Malaga's services sector are 'autónomos', compared with 73 per cent in Andalucía and a similar proportion in Spain as a whole.

Malaga is similar to the Canary Islands in this respect but their figures are higher than the Balearics and Valencia, the two other most popular Spanish holiday destinations.

The number of technology companies in Malaga province should also be taken into account, some of which are major international names. Numerous startup businesses have been created on a self-employed basis as a result of their presence in the province in order to provide services to them.

More than 20% of self-employed are foreigners

The ecosystem generated by these businesses, and other geographical characteristics of Malaga province, have attracted digital nomads from all over the world in recent years, to such an extent that over 20 per cent of those registered as self-employed are foreigners: 22 per cent, in fact, which is more than 18,800 people.

The figure for foreign self-employed workers Spain as a whole is 13.3 per cent of the total, and it is barely 10.5 per cent for the region of Andalucía.

Those in Malaga province account for half of the total of foreign 'autónomo' workers, and it is the fourth province in the country in this respect. Only in Madrid, Barcelona and Alicante are the figures higher.

Lowest social security rate

One aspect in which the self-employed in Malaga do coincide with Andalucía and Spain is that the vast majority paid the minimum rate of social security in 2022. In fact, there are comparatively more self-employed people in this province paying the lowest rate than in the region or the country: the figure for Malaga is 89 per cent of the total, compared with 87 and 85 per cent respectively.

In addition, most of them are registered as self-employed businesses with no employees: those account for 78 per cent in Malaga, whereas in Andalucía the figure is 75 per cent and in Spain it is 79 per cent.

Sources at the self-employed workers union of Andalucía (UATAE) explain that the fact that so many people are paying in the minimum rate of social security payments every month may be because their earnings are low, or because they are very young and are therefore not concerned about their retirement situation yet.

The most recent figures show that nearly 30 per cent of self-employed workers in Malaga province are under the age of 40, whereas the figure for Spain is 25.7 per cent.

José Luis Perea of ATA also adds that another cause of so many people paying as little as they can could be the fear that their business will not be successful. That concern tends to be greater in the early days of their new venture.

In Spain, 56.3 per cent of self-employed people have been registered as such for five years or more, whereas in Malaga province the figure is ten per cent lower.

A changing system

This model of lower social security payments resulting in fewer benefits is now coming to an end in this country. From this year onwards, and progressively, the amount of money that self-employed workers will be able to pay as their social security contributions each month will depend on their level of income, and this will bring with it several improvements to their rights.

This is basically what is involved in the latest reform of the system which has been designed by Minister for Inclusion, Social Security and Migrations José Luis Escrivá.

As José Luis Pérez explains, the aim is that, eventually, being self-employed will mean having practically the same rights as people who are employees of companies and therefore have work contracts with more retirement benefits.

"You join the world of the self-employed through vocation or because of need"

Working for oneself can be a precarious business. On one hand, there is the problem with the 'fake self-employed', where firms avoid the higher costs of taking on staff by hiring 'autónomos' instead for fixed roles. But on the other hand, setting up in business can be a way forward after being made redundant, especially for someone aged 40 to 45. "You join the world of the self-employed through vocation or because of need," say sources at the ATA.

The inconvenience of doing so for the second reason, explains the UATAE, is that people often lack the entrepreneurial spirit, the dedication needed to create a business of their own, or they just fancy a life without bosses. In addition, those who do so because they want to be independent rarely have as much stability or drive and are more likely to suffer ups and downs because they do not normally understand the conditions of the market. And in many cases, if the opportunity arises, they end up going back to work for somebody else.

Relief for Britons as Spain approves driving licence swap

Many UK residents who still hold a British permit had been stopped from driving while waiting for an easy exchange arrangement to be agreed

SUR IN ENGLISH

MALAGA. There was a mixture of relief and joy - and perhaps a bit of disbelief - this week for thousands of Britons living in Spain who have been unable to drive on Spanish roads since May last year.

On Tuesday, the Spanish Cabinet finally approved the deal between Madrid and London which allows a British resident to swap a UK driving licence to a Spanish one without taking a test, including those with expired licences. Those already affected now have six months to complete the exchange.

The previous easy-swap process for Britons ended after Brexit and both sides failed to successfully negotiate a new bilateral arangement until recently. Since Brexit, a UK licence is only valid for six months after a Briton comes to live in Spain. The only alternative since the middle of 2022 has been to take a Spanish test from scratch, which had long waiting times. Most of those affected chose not to take a Spanish test.

Throughout the wait, the British Embassy's Brits in Spain Facebook page had kept people informed of how the slow negotiations had been going.

Ambassador's latest message

The UK ambassador, Hugh Elliott, said in his message after the announcement that the deal would go live from Thursday this week, 16 March, and that he hoped it would be the last time he would need to make an update.

Many UK residents expressed appreciation that the wait was over. Drivers who still have a valid UK photocard licence or an expired one can consult the Spanish DGT website for the exact new process.

There was some confusion

Many UK residents can now drive again without fear of being fined. sUR

however on Thursday as the DGT published details on its website.

Some of those affected who had renewed an expired licence in the UK while resident in Spain in the intervening period, which was technically a breach of long-standing rules, were unclear if their recently renewed UK licences would now be accepted by Spanish authorities for exchange or not.

The UK Embassy said it was planning a Facebook Live forum to answer questions on the new agreement in the coming weeks.

Tourists and short-term visitors to Spain from the UK can continue to drive using their valid British licence as before.

As part of the arrangement, the authorities in both countries will be stepping up their exchange of information on drivers to enable them to enforce traffic fines more effectively, even for visitors.

Gibraltar driving licences part of UK-Spain exchange pact

SUR

GIBRALTAR. People who hold Gibraltar-issued driving licences will be able to continue to use them when visiting Spain without the need for an International Driving Permit now that the UK and Spain have reached an agreement over reciprocal recognition and exchange of driving licences.

The Gibraltar government issued a statement welcoming the approval by Spain's Cabinet and explained that it will be applied regardless of the outcome of the ongoing negotiations over Gibraltar's future relationship with the European Union.

Now that this agreement is in force, holders of Gibraltar driving licences who are officially resident in Spain may exchange them for a Spanish licence without needing to take a practical or theory test. This must be done within six months from 16 March, (or after six months of going to live in Spain).

Mercury rises on the coast

Even before the official start of spring, unusually high temperatures on the Costa del Sol last weekend led many to discard their hats, coats and scarves and don their swimsuits to head to the beach. The mercury hit 30C in some areas as the weather event dubbed the '96-hour-summer' rolled in and quickly rolled out again. This week national weather agency Aemet warned of a "rollercoaster" few days with sudden "sharp rises and falls" in temperatures which are expected to be "between 5C and 10C above normal" for the time of year. Spring is just around the corner but the forecast indicates that unstable weather will herald the start of the season.

BENALMÁDEN. Two beaches in Benalmádena, Torrebermeja and Las Gaviotas, will be closed to the public on weekdays from Monday 20 March while work takes place on the extension of the Malapesquera breakwater, the town hall announced earlier this week. Beach bars and other seaside businesses will be able to open as usual. The beaches will reopen to the public for the weekend on Friday afternoons, when the machinery stops working. Work is expected to stop at the beginning of July for a biological stoppage period until December to protect an endangered species of limpet.

New Estepona town hall building officially opens

Latticework will keep out the sun's rays while solar panels on the roof will collect the energy needed to make it self-sufficient

DAVID LERMA

ESTEPONA. Hundreds of local residents attended the official opening of the new Estepona town hall on Friday last week. The building even includes a slide connecting the fourth and fifth floors - an iconic reminder of the town's failed attempt to have a long public slide in a nearby park. That closed the day after it opened four years ago after users were injured when sliding down it.

Now Estepona's mayor, José María García Urbano, is able to laugh at the mistake and has incorporated a slide into the design of the new council headquarters. However, this unusual facility is for the use of town hall staff but may be available to the public occasionally.

At the moment it is just the ground floor of the building that is open to the public while work to the upper floors is ongoing. During the opening ceremony, García Urbano said, "This is the culmination of twelve years of tremendous work."

The white latticework covering the new town hall is designed to keep out the sun's rays, while on its roof solar panels will collect the energy needed to make it self-sufficient. However, the budget for the state-of-the-art environmentally friendly building overran by 1.8 million euros.

The president of Malaga's provincial authority, the Diputación, Francisco Salado, said that the new building would "make history", and added: "What Estepona has done will be studied, it is a benchmark for sustainable modernity."

Famous Marbella clinic creates a space for insects to thrive

The Arboretum Foundation has helped with the project that will allow pollinating invertebrates to feed and safely reproduce

JOAQUINA DUEÑAS

MARBELLA. The well-known Marbella Buchinger Wilhelmi Clinic, which over the years has seen a long list of celebrity clients, now has guests of equally high global standing - pollinating insects - thanks to the Arboretum Foundation, which has created the first pollen refuge in the clinic's grounds.

This is a joint project carried out in a 30-square-metre area where the association, together with the clinic, has created a space in which bees, wasps and butterflies can feed and reproduce. They have transformed the ornamental garden into a sustainable and ecological habitat where plants such as mal-lows, daisies, caraway and marigolds grow.

Pollinators

The foundation explained that "it was essential to have good orientation, lighting and protection from the wind to ensure not only food for the pollinators, but also protection for them to lay their eggs and be able to multiply". It went on to say that it will provide "a place where bees, wasps, butterflies and beetles have a safe space for food and shelter".

For Victor Wilhelmi, director of the clinic, the benefits and significance of this initiative are many. He explained that the clinic helps its clients, "through self-healing processes of the body and access to good and healthy nutrition, and since seeds and their care bear good fruit, we believe that bees play an important role in the process".

Europe's longest classic car run, with 140 vehicles taking part, rolls into Ronda

VANESSA MELGAR

RONDA. The Spain Classic Raid IX, the longest classic car run in Europe, will stop off in Ronda on Saturday 18 March, as the participating vehicles are scheduled to make a stop at the town's bullring. The race runs from Cadiz to Santander, crossing Spain - from top to the bottom - in eight days over eight stages. The Ronda stage will be the first, starting in Cadiz and finishing in Antequera. In total, the participants will cover 2,000 kilometres, with an average of 250 kilometres per day. In total, there will be 140 cars which are 25 years old or older taking part.

Popular La Paloma park in Benalmádena is declared a smoke-free zone

An agreement has been reached between the town hall and a Spanish cancer association to raise awareness of the risk of smoking

MARINA RIVAS

BENALMÁDENA. The council in Benalmádena has strengthened ties with leading Spanish cancer charity AECC as one of its best-known attractions has been declared a ‘smoke-free space’. This is the Parque de la Paloma, opened in 1995 and considered the green lung of the town thanks to its 200,000 square metres of greenery, together with an artificial lake and even animals.

Town mayor, Víctor Navas, said, “We are the first large town on the Costa del Sol to have a tobacco-free zone.”

There is a sign on each entrance gate to the park, but it is only there to raise awareness of the risks of smoking and that 80 per cent of lung tumours are directly related to tobacco use, as the measure cannot legally be enforced.

Passive smoking

The AECC has reminded users how harmful passive smoke inhalation by people or even children can be. Tobacco smoke increases the chances in minors who are regularly exposed to it of ear infections by half, asthma attacks by 20%, respiratory infections by 30%. It also doubles the risk of having lung cancer in the future.

Council buys 'quiet' leaf blowers and street cleaning machinery

J.D.

MARBELLA. Marbella town hall has invested in eleven leaf blowers and other machines to “minimise the inconvenience to the public and facilitate the work of the operatives” according to councillor Diego López. He explained, “They are quieter tools, vibrate less and are more ergonomic, so they are more comfortable for the workers because they can be attached to their bodies, hooking them to the waist, and they do not have to carry them in their hands.”

He added that “the blowers also improve efficiency because, as they are quieter, the working day can start earlier”.

The purchase of the new machinery forms part of a strategy to modernise the street cleaning and urban waste department.

Threat of strike over Malaga Airport control tower privatisation

MATÍAS STUBER

MALAGA. The CCOO union has announced that all of their 560 members at Malaga Airport, and not just the air traffic controllers, would stop work if the Spanish government pressed ahead with its plans to privatise the control tower.

Unions and workers have intensified their rejection of the privatisation plan, alluding to the fact that “the quality of service will be lost” and that it will not mean any real savings in economic terms.

The only thing that would be achieved, according to CCOO, would be a diversion of costs to benefit the private companies that take charge of the control towers.

Mamadou, the migrant who overcame his fear of the sea to save a life on a Costa beach

Bravery. The 19-year-old, who is waiting for his asylum application to be processed by Spanish authorities, rescued a swimmer in distress off a Malaga beach

IRENE QUIRANTE

An act of humanity can break down barriers. This is the story of Mamadou, a 19-year-old from Senegal who, despite his fear of the sea, went to the rescue of a bather who was calling for help off La Malagueta beach in Malaga.

"I realised that something was wrong because people were looking at the water, as if they were worried. When I saw what was happening I knew I had to do something; in my heart, it was impossible not to help," explained Mamadou.

He remembered the faces of various friends and acquaintances who all died at sea after entrusting their fate to a crossing in a small boat in search of a better life. "I didn't want the same thing to happen to the swimmer."

Risked his life

It was early February when Mamadou risked his life in the sea once again. Details are hazy, and he has no idea how long it took him to reach the man in distress. He does remember that by the time they both reached the shore, he felt completely exhausted and freezing cold.

Once at the shore, he could see that the man was conscious, and that another man, believed to be a tourist, was helping him. Mamadou required medical attention for hypothermia and was transferred to hospital by ambulance.

Mamadou did not get the chance to speak to the person whose life he saved, although he would have liked to. He later learned that it was a 45-year-old Spanish man.

Within hours, he was discharged but returned to the hospital soon after to check that everything was in order. "I have a heart problem," he explained. It was this heart condition that led him to decide to leave Senegal, where, he says, he had no chance of receiving treatment.

Boat trip from Senegal

Mamadou grew up in Mbour, a coastal region about 80 kilometres from the capital, Dakar. He arrived in the Canary Islands when he was still 17 years old, surviving a boat trip that lasted ten days. He remembers that close to a hundred people travelled with him and that, in the middle of the immensity of the sea, he was convinced on several occasions that that could be the end of his life.

According to data from the Spanish Commission for Refugee Assistance (CEAR), 812 people died last year trying to reach the Spanish coast from parts of Africa. The Canary Islands route has become the main route of entry by sea to Spain, but it is also one of the deadliest. More than 1,500 people lost their lives trying to arrive by boat from 2021 to October 2022.

Asylum application

Mamadou arrived in the Canary Islands the same year as the outbreak of the pandemic and about eleven months ago he was transferred to Malaga. He wants to train and work in catering and imagines himself earning a living in a kitchen. Although, for the moment, these dreams are on hold, as his asylum application has not yet been approved.

The young Senegalese man has the support of CEAR, which has given him shelter in one of its housing facilities, helps him with Spanish classes and assists him in the legal procedure to try to resolve the asylum application. Most importantly, he has the emotional support of CEAR, which is the closest thing to a family that the young man has in Malaga.

His life has been linked to the coast since he was a child. In his home country, he spent his days at the port, buying and selling fish. Since he was a boy, he heard stories of neighbours who tried to migrate to Europe and were never heard from again. This is where his respect and fear for the sea grew, and despite everything, Mamadou did not hesitate to overcome his fear when he heard the cries for help on La Malagueta beach.

Candidate for city mayor would ban new tourist apartments

ANTONIO M. ROMERO

MALAGA. The PSOE candidate for mayor of Malaga city in May's municipal elections has said he wants to follow the example of Palma de Mallorca if he is elected and ban new tourist apartments "to avoid urban speculation".

Daniel Pérez made the announcement on his Twitter account this week in a video recorded with the mayor of Palma, José Hila, since the objective of the candidate is to follow the example of the Balearic island capital, where the ban on tourists holidays using normal family homes in the city began in 2018. That measure has recently been upheld by a Supreme Court ruling.

"Malaga suffers from a serious housing shortage and one of the major factors is tourist housing, which is eating up the city, especially in the centre, and is making it impossible for locals to find rental properties. You have to take action. A brave mayor is needed to put a stop to tourist rentals that are creating a serious problem in the city. Can it be done? It only takes will, as municipalities such as Palma de Mallorca have shown by providing a solution to the problem," said Pérez. However, the AVVA association of tourist housing in Andalucía accused Pérez of using the tourist industry as a scapegoat for other problems.

Black banners in protest over 'abandoned' town centre

Vélez-Málaga's mayor Antonio Moreno Ferrer admitted in a television interview that the situation is "complex"

EUGENIO CABEZAS

VÉLEZ-MÁLAGA. Around 200 black banners appeared on balconies in Vélez-Málaga town centre on Tuesday bearing the hashtag 'Vélez is dying'. The protest is over what the local residents describe as the "abandonment" of the town centre.

The initiative has come from the San Francisco and San Juan neighbourhood association, which has been calling for change for a number of years. President of the association Fran Delgado told the radio station Cadena Ser that they have been "overwhelmed" by the requests to place flags on the balconies. In an interview on Axarquía television the mayor of Vélez, Antonio Moreno Ferrer, admitted that the situation in the town centre is "complex".

Residents have been asked to remove the banners for Holy Week.

Giant sculptures instrumental in attracting tourists

Benamocarra town hall has introduced a series of giant musical instruments around the village to pay tribute to the composer Eduardo Ocón (1833-1901), who was born there, and to its municipal band, which the town hall says is the oldest of its kind in Andalucía. So far there are six sculptures, which were unveiled in September 2022 to coincide with the village's 22nd Día de la Música, a day on which the deeply-rooted musical tradition is celebrated. A giant flamenco guitar, saxophone, clarinet, bass drum, cymbals and a horn can already be seen in Plaza del Calvario, Plaza de la Música and Salvador Palma Park. Councillor José Ramón Palomo has said that in the coming months a further six instruments will be added, "to increase the attraction and make visitors come to the village".

Mayor of Nerja José Alberto Armijo called for the intervention to be accelerated so that it can be ready for Easter. Salas highlighted the "commitment" to developing the El Playazo promenade project, which has been in the pipeline since 2014.

Food prices were up in February despite IVA cut on some items

The overall rate of annual inflation in Spain remained at 6% last month but food stood higher at 16.6%

EDURNE MARTÍNEZ

MADRID. Despite the IVA sales tax reductions in January, the price of food has continued to rise. In February, the annual Consumer Price Index (CPI) in Spain for food stood at 16.6%, according to data from the country's national institute of statistics (INE). This represented a one point increase from the CPI in January.

The general annual inflation rate remained at 6% in February, one-tenth below what was forecast by the INE.

Given the recent rise in food prices, the Spanish government decided to reduce or eliminate IVA on some basic products. This cost-saving measure, which was applied from 1 January, had only a partial impact that month when food inflation remained at 15.4%, a rate that could have been "two per cent higher" if this measure had not been taken, said Minister of Agriculture Luis Planas.

Food prices continue to rise. SUR

However, February saw more increases in food costs across practically all products with reduced IVA. Bread was more expensive by 0.8% in February compared to the previous month, milk by 1.7%, cheese by 0.5%, eggs by 0.7% and potatoes by 2.3%.

Food items where the IVA was reduced to 5% or 10% also increased in February. Olive oil became more expensive by 2.7%, bottled water rose by 4.4% and coffee by 2.3%.

The rise in food prices translates into an increase of 924 euros per year in the shopping budget according to the calculations of the OCU consumers association.

The result of a recent survey by the group revealed that people in Spain have reduced their consumption of fresh products such as meat and fish by 32%, as well as fruit and vegetables by 18%, due to higher prices.

Firm that owns Zara announces record sales for 2022 and surge in profits

Amancio Ortega, founder, received 2.2 billion euros in dividends and his daughter, Marta Ortega, was paid 834,000 euros

EDURNE MARTÍNEZ

LA CORUÑA. The Spanish company that owns Zara and a raft of other high-street fashion brands recorded record sales last year.

Galicia-based Inditex got its turnover back to pre-Covid levels in 2022 and went a long way beyond that. The multinational, also behind names such as Bershka, Pull & Bear and Massimo Dutti, made 32.6 billion euros in sales, 17% more than in the 2021 financial year and 15% more than in 2019, before the outbreak of the pandemic. This caused a sharp drop in its revenue due to the closure of shops around the world.

Net profit also soared to 4.13 billion euros, 27% more than the previous year and 15% more than in 2019, according to the accounts which were filed on Wednesday this week.

The announcement marked the first anniversary of Marta Ortega, daughter of founder Amancio Ortega, taking over as head of the company.

The good news came without the contribution of the Russian market, which represented 8.5% of the group's net operating profit but where, after the outbreak of the war, Inditex decided to suspend its activity and sell its more than 500 shops to the Daher group.

Despite these good results, the market did not react favourably and the company fell almost 5% on the stock market at midday, with shares at 27.7 euros per share.

Amancio Ortega, founder and largest shareholder, received 2.2 billion euros in dividends and Marta Ortega, who acts as non-executive chairperson, received 834,000 euros

The CEO, Óscar García Maцейras, who has also been in the post a year, earned 8.3 million euros including share benefits.

Stocks or bonds?

The investor debate over the effectiveness of stocks versus bonds is as old as investing itself. Today investors are being forced to confront the debate again. Since the financial crisis of 2008, the monetary policy of central banks has systematically destroyed the purchasing power of currency by keeping interest rates artificially low and inflating prices of stocks artificially high. As a result, owners of stocks have done well, while a majority of those without stocks have not.

Bonds - loans that pay a fixed interest (coupon) to the holder - have proved genuinely more reliable than stocks over time. Stocks - part-ownership of a company - have generally produced better long-term returns. In his classic book, Stocks for the Long Run, Professor Jeremy Siegal provides data showing that between 1821 and 2021, stocks have produced +6.9%, bonds have produced +3.6%, and treasury bills have produced cash equivalent of +2.5%. However, this assumes that the investor is always fully invested and does not try to time when it is better to have more bonds, stocks or cash. Markets are made of people, and prices move in cycles. On occasions, this price fluctuation can be violent - as we have been witnessing in 2021 and 2022. This can make investors fearful until the pain forces them to sell at a loss, often never to return. This is precisely the wrong thing to do. The worst mistake an investor can make is to turn an unrealised capital loss into a permanent, irreplaceable loss.

For two decades, a portfolio of 60/40 allocations of stocks to bonds has given investors a modest safe return. Though this 60/40 allocation of stocks and bonds is now out of favour, it showed the invisible hand spoken about by Adam Smith, the celebrated economist of the 1800s: these portfolios produced consistent returns. Until they didn't!

For many investors since the crash of 2008, the solution has been to throw the baby out with the bathwater. Today with the US central bank leading the charge of aggressively raising interest rates, yields on government treasury bonds are approaching 5%. This means that the yield from US Treasury bonds has fallen to forty-year lows. We know we will receive from US stocks a dividend currently of 1.74%.

At the end of 2022, the sage of Omaha, Warren Buffet, held 92.7bn short term securities cash equivalent in the Berkshire Hathaway portfolio, and another 25bn in fixed interest securities, yielding a little more than cash. In addition, Berkshire held 308bn in stocks. Buffet's retirement portfolio for his wife is 90% invested in a broad US Index Fund with 10% in short-dated cash equivalent or fixed interest securities. In times of heightened uncertainty, it is very difficult to invest with conviction. To err on the side of safety may bring a feeling of short-term relief, but to buy when others are fearful and remaining invested will produce superior investment outcomes over time.

Spain to extradite Briton who hacked Twitter of Biden and Obama

US accuses man from Malaga known as Plugwalk Joe of 14 crimes including extortion, illegal access to computer systems and money laundering

MELCHOR SÁIZ-PARDO

MADRID. Spain has agreed to extradite Joseph James O'Connor, also known as Plugwalk Joe, to the United States.

The 23-year-old British man is accused of having launched a series of virtual attacks from Malaga in July 2020, which included the alleged hacking of the Twitter accounts of, among others, Joe Biden, Barack Obama, and Bill Gates.

He is also accused of extorting money from another personality and being involved in various robberies via the internet.

A top court has agreed to hand over O'Connor to face fourteen criminal charges in the United States. In Spain, according to the interpretation of the judges, these charges would be equivalent to the crimes of discovery and disclosure of secrets, belonging to a criminal organisation, extortion, illegal access to computer systems, computer fraud and money laundering.

The court rejected all the arguments put forward by the defendant's team, including the disproportionality of the sentences which he could be given in the United States or that the jurisdiction for the prosecution should fall to the Spanish courts since the computer servers used were in Spain.

The investigation carried out by the United States alleges that O'Connor led a campaign of cyberattacks against 130 Twitter accounts as well as hacking the Snapchat account of a public figure who he tried to extort money from by threatening to spread nude photos of him.

Authorities in Washington have also linked the accused to several incidents of 'swatting', making of false hoax calls to emergency services. O'Connor allegedly called the police with false threats, including blowing up an airport and that an armed man wanted to kill his wife and children.

ANDALUCÍA

HÉCTOR BARBOTTA. On Monday this week the president of the Junta de Andalucía, Juanma Moreno, signed a far-reaching agreement on social welfare financing after "complex" negotiations with regional trade union and employers' representatives.

The central part of the deal envisages allocating more than 3bn euros to strengthen primary care and GP services in Andalucía.

In total, some nine billion euros are expected to be spent, nearly half of which correspond to urgent measures to support families, workers, the self-employed and companies, and to reinforce essential public services.

These include a direct aid voucher aimed at families with children in vulnerable conditions and below the severe poverty threshold. There will also be a one-off 200-euro food voucher for families with dependent children whose income is less than three times the minimum income indicator, currently set at 600 euros per month.

Other measures include guarantees on new mortgages taken out by the under-35s and grants for small firms and the self-employed.

IN BRIEF

ENERGY

Algeria is leading gas supplier once again

SUR. Algeria has once again become Spain's leading supplier of natural gas after a year in which the price crisis had been joined by the diplomatic conflict between the two countries over Spain's new stance on self-determination in its former Western Sahara colony. In the first two months of the year, 24.2 per cent of total imports came from Algeria, via the Mezgaz pipeline.

ACCIDENT

Crashed copter had undeclared passenger

SUR. A third person was involved in the Spanish traffic surveillance helicopter crash last week, despite original reports that only the pilot and the camera operator had been on board. Sources said the third occupant was the camera operator's wife, who was not authorised to be inside. The pilot of the aircraft was detained after showing positive in a drugs test.

THE EURO ZONE MARK NAYLER

Split three ways

Josep Borrell, formerly foreign minister under Pedro Sánchez and now occupant of the same role for the EU, seems to want to have it both ways in the dispute over Western Sahara. Last weekend he visited Algerian president Abdelmadjid Tebboune to assure him that Brussels is keen to find a solution to the North African country's standoff with Spain, which was triggered last March when Sánchez suddenly endorsed Morocco's autonomy plan for Western Sahara. Algeria, whose Polisario Front movement supports a UN-backed referendum for the Saharawi people, was furious.

Borrell initially backed Spain's announcement that Morocco's plan for Western Sahara was the most "serious, realistic and credible" way of resolving this seemingly intractable dispute. In a TV interview shortly after Sánchez announced the U-Turn, which reversed decades of Spanish neutrality, Borrell said that the new stance was "still within the framework of the UN" and that the "the EU continues to advocate the same approach".

Algeria, one of Spain's largest suppliers of liquefied natural gas, was so angry at this EU-backed reversal of Spanish foreign policy that in June last year it suspended its twenty year-old friendship treaty with Spain and froze import and export ties (excluding gas exports). Madrid seemed to have patched up relations with Rabat, but only at the cost of cordial diplomacy with another of its key north African allies.

You can imagine Morocco's surprise, therefore, when in August last year Borrell appeared to completely change tack over Western Sahara. Speaking to the Spanish TV channel RTVE, the PSOE member claimed that the position of both the Spanish government and of the EU was "defending the holding of a consultation [i.e. referendum] so that it is the Sahrawi people who decide how they want their future to be".

Was this what it seemed - an endorsement of Algeria's call for a self-determination referendum for the Sahrawi population and a rejection of Morocco's autonomy plan? The two countries involved seemed to think so: Morocco slammed Borrell's remarks as "incoherent" and the country's foreign minister promptly cancelled a meeting the two had scheduled for September. The Polisario Front, though, felt vindicated, saying that the EU minister's announcement showed that "attempts to circumvent the right of the Sahrawi people have not only complicated the situation, but also kept it away from a just solution".

In urging Algeria to ease its hostilities with Spain, Borrell is trying to smooth over a diplomatic row to which he himself has made a substantial - and apparently self-contradictory - contribution. One wonders whether he has the diplomatic nuance to broker an agreement in this complex three-way affair, in which Spain can't please Morocco without angering Algeria or vice versa.

Long-awaited Gibraltar runway tunnel to open within weeks

It has taken around 15 years to build, but at last drivers will no longer have to stop and wait while planes land and take off

DEBBIE BARTLETT

GIBRALTAR. The tunnel beneath the airport runway in Gibraltar should be open within a few weeks, chief minister Fabian Picardo said in response to a question raised in parliament on Wednesday.

This will be welcome news for drivers, because it will mean that traffic no longer has to cross the runway and will not be held up when planes land or take off.

By the time the 350-metre tunnel, which will be known as the Eastside Tunnel, is open, the project will have taken nearly 15 years to complete since the initial contract was awarded in 2008.

The chief minister said it would be open before the next meeting of the Gibraltar parliament takes place.

Gibraltar runway is currently crossed by traffic and pedestrians. D.B.

The project has been plagued with setbacks and delays and several completion dates have been indicated over the years but have come and gone.

Gibraltar is one of the few places in the world where traffic and pedestrians have to cross an airport runway to gain access or to exit, but as the long-awaited tunnel will be for traffic only when it opens, those on foot and cyclists will still be able to enjoy this unusual experience.

Gibraltar man jailed for 'terrifying' attack

D.B. A 34-year-old Gibraltar man has been sentenced to seven months in jail for threatening a woman with a saw on Christmas Day last year. Stuart Harrison is said to have grabbed her by the neck and struck her on the face, cutting her lip, before holding an 18-inch-long saw against her neck and saying he was going to cut her throat, in what the magistrate described in court as a "terrifying" attack.

CULTURE

Local authors to be included in a directory

D.B. The new Gibraltar National Book Council is inviting writers on the Rock to submit a brief biography, maximum 200 words, highlighting their work and linking to their websites, for inclusion in a directory of local authors. The GNBC is also organising a networking event in the near future, where authors can exchange ideas, give feedback and enjoy readings of selected works.

Dealing with lost cards

I read Mark Nayler's article in SUR in English (Get In Line, February 10th) with interest, but also with disbelief. Mr Nayler was complaining about the length of time it took to get a replacement TIE and blaming it on Pedro Sánchez and his PSOE-led government.

I don't know where Mr Nayler lives, but my experience of carrying out the same procedure in Ronda recently was completely different.

I lost my wallet late on a Friday night in the town. I cancelled all my cards over that weekend and on the Monday went to the Comisaría de Policía to make a denuncia. My TIE was cancelled immediately. As the Foreigners' office is in the same building, I managed to get to speak to a nice lady in that department. She gave me the necessary forms and offered me a cita previa for the following week. I was going to be away from Spain, so she gave me one for two weeks hence.

That seemed like a long time to me; obviously not, if Mark Nayler's experience is anything to go by!

At that meeting I handed in my completed forms with proof of payment of the fee and they took my fingerprints. I had to go back three weeks later to collect my new card.

The whole process took about six weeks. It would have been only four, if I could have taken the first appointment offered. Pretty efficient, I reckon. Pedro Sánchez is to be praised, methinks, for introducing such a well-organised system, in Ronda, at least.

Perhaps you should move to Ronda, Mr Nayler, or, better still, not lose your TIE.

Money misspent

Recently a new two-lane 500-metre-long public road was built beside Aloha College. There are 17 access metal covers and frames on one side incorrectly installed now sinking which will have a detrimental effect to vehicles. If ever an example of taxpayers' money incorrectly misspent and road building incompetence this is it.

Fridge of sighs

The irony of the very telephones which have consistently numbered and stifled our imaginations with their constant barrage of largely inconsequential information being called 'smart' is vividly striking. However, it certainly doesn't stop there.

Samsung have recently developed a new feature for their smart refrigerators (no, really). This involves a camera which is able to identify what food you have in your fridge and suggest recipes that you can make with the available ingredients. I'd love to see what it could do with the cooled fayre available in my house: half a tub of margarine, some cider apple vinegar (absolutely no idea), an onion, three carrots that have seen better days, some bits of bacon, two eggs laid some time during the Boer War, six cherry tomatoes and a few mushrooms (these could conceivably be the direct offspring of the ageing carrots). I think the only possible conclusion that even the smartest app in the world could come up with would be some kind of ghastly soup concoction or a new recipe for penicillin.

Whenever I go to other people's houses, their fridges are unfailingly replete with an ample range of foodstuffs guaranteed to satisfy every whim of even the most discerning palate: a selection of hams, cheeses, sauces, wines and all manner of fruit and vegetables. Plus loads of jars of things that surely must have been sitting there longer than my carrots. There are two possible explanations for this. First, these people actually live like this and dine in the manner of Henry VIII every evening or, alternatively, they leg it to the shops the day before I arrive just because they're having somebody round and normally the contents of their fridge is as baffling and unappetising as mine. I do hope it's the latter, otherwise my life is little more than a shameful sham.

A spokesperson for Samsung, who may or may not have a massive forehead and ill-fitting spectacles, said, "The average person wastes 238 pounds of food annually, making up 21% of the food they buy. Whisk's Food A.I. understands what's in your fridge and recommends recipes to use those ingredients up before they go bad." And there's the rub.

If you've got a fridge consistently jam-packed with a vast range of goodies, the chances are you'll end up wasting a fair share of what's in there. If, on the other hand, your selection of victuals is, let's say, rather more minimalist, your corresponding wastage will be much less which, I'm sure you'll agree, makes you an infinitely better person and a fine, upstanding citizen.

All of which leaves only one remaining question: why on earth did I once buy a bottle of apple cider vinegar?

Numbers

I've been failing maths since my last year at primary school. That summer was the first that I spent going to extra classes every morning so that I wouldn't have to retake the whole year. I passed the exam in September and chose pure sciences at secondary school so I could be in the same class as my best friend.

I found physics and chemistry really hard work, but I had to cheat at maths all the way through. My best friend really was my best friend and we swapped papers in every exam.

On 8 March I was driving and listening to the radio. All day they were talking about women in science, the lack of motivation due to a variety of factors, such as the lack of examples to follow, gender stereotypes, unconscious bias and structural barriers.

I think about my experience and, except for the wonderful teacher I had at night school (something I had to go through when I decided I wanted to go to university) where I got top marks all the time, I failed with all the others as they didn't make maths attractive.

They made it so I was scared when I walked into the class. Scared of the blackboard, scared of the numbers, scared of the subject. However the woman at night school taught maths in another light. Thanks to her, I lost my insecurity and my ineptitude in mathematics.

Today I can say that my work is 50 per cent words and 50 per cent numbers. I do my household and work accounts and I'm addicted to Excel spreadsheets.

Listening to the radio, I got the impression that what happened to me won't happen to girls in the future.

I like to think of the efforts that are being made and the paths being opened to make sure talent is not going unnoticed.

Talent such as that of those elderly women who can't read or write but still manage to administer their household finances.

These numbers have nothing to do with academic study and everything to do with survival. They are our lances and arrows. Contemporary hunting tools. For the most extreme survival.

I think it is so important for teaching to start from the beginning with care and affection, being treated with love rather than as a punishment.

Now I have a lock of grey hair on my forehead it's good to think that all that happened to me in the 80s and 90s. That I am of another generation and it doesn't happen any more. That teaching has to help you to shine, to find your diamond. And teach you to do sums without having to swap exam papers.

IN THE FRAME

A musical journey from Motherwell to the Costa del Sol

Dex Park, who arrived in Malaga in 2003, talks to SUR in English about his early years in Glasgow and his life and career on the coast

TONY BRYANT

The Costa del Sol has long been known for its varied and exciting music scene. The region is popular with musicians from all over the globe, some of whom have been associated with world-renowned bands, while others are semi-professional musicians who are happy to earn a mediocre living performing along the coast.

Dex Park is a musician who arrived on the Costa del Sol in 2003 and has since gained a reputation for his incredible musicianship by performing in several established bands on the Costa, as well as being a regular face at the numerous jam sessions that bring together musicians from all over the province.

Dex is not a former member of a chart-topping rock band but he has had an interesting career.

Born in Motherwell in 1958, he began playing guitar in his early teens and went on to perform in an established Glasgow-based rock band called Dodger who appeared on the popular television programme, Back on the Streets.

Dex grew up believing he was the only musician in the family, although he would learn later in life that his grandmother, who died before he was born, was a respected musician.

"Neither of my parents were musicians. I was around 20 when mother told me that my grandmother was a violinist and pianist who had played in the Scottish National Orchestra. This surprised me, but it could explain from where my musical roots evolve," the proud Scot tells SUR in English.

Passion for the Costa

The guitarist and vocalist, who studied Music Production and Sound Engineering at Glasgow College, came to live on the Costa del Sol with his family after enjoying numerous holidays in the area. They first settled in Fuengirola although later decided to move to a remote town in the Granada province. They returned to the coast one year later and set up home in El Faro.

"We had visited the coast for several holidays and we had talked about coming to live here many times. One day we just did it. We have no regrets about coming to live here. It's fantastic. We love this area,"

Dex Park has established himself as one of the most respected musicians on the Costa del Sol. SUR

he explains.

Before coming to live in Spain, Dex, who will celebrate his 65th birthday in July, was performing in an eight-piece band called Mac Floyd, a project that would prove beneficial many years later on the coast.

"We were a Pink Floyd tribute and at that time tribute bands hadn't really taken off, so we kind of got in there quite early on. We gigged all over the country in a van and then over to Belgium. It was a lot of travelling, but great fun," he says.

Since arriving in Spain, Dex has formed several popular groups, including Dirty Little Secrets, a pop and rock covers band; and Stone F3ee, a band that covered Hendrix, Clapton and Cream songs.

His current project is a five-piece band called Dead Ringer,

"We visited the coast for several holidays and we had talked about coming to live here many times. One day we just did it. We have no regrets" a tribute to Meat Loaf, which he has taken to some of the top entertainment venues along the coast. He also performs in a duo called the Disclaimers, which is a scaled-down version of Dead Ringer.

"The five-piece is for the larger venues but we came up with the duo so we can perform at smaller bars and clubs. The duo is easier to organise because most of the members of the five-piece band also play in other groups, so it can be difficult to get that together," he explains.

Along with his tribute bands, Dex is also one of the musicians who is participating in the Pink Floyd Experience, an ensemble of around a dozen local musicians and vocalists that are preparing for a one-off performance in the Benalmádena auditorium on Saturday 27 May. The project, the idea of fellow musician Steve Hughes, includes some of the coast's most celebrated performers who have come together to present the ultimate Pink Floyd experience.

"I was very happy to be asked to participate in this project. It's a lot of work, but it is all going to plan. It involves some great musicians and singers, so this is a great project to be involved with," he concludes.

Malaga feasts on Spanish film

SUR

There has been a buzz in the air in Malaga this week after the city's annual film festival opened last weekend.

The warm, sunny weather has added the perfect backdrop to the style and glamour provided by the stream of actors and directors posing for cameras on Muelle Uno quayside and outside the Cervantes theatre and Albéniz cinema, two of the main venues for the screenings and events.

Meanwhile, street terraces have been spilling over all week with lanyard-wearing reporters, camera crews and professionals of the film industry, a sign of Malaga's growing importance on the global festival scene.

The Malaga festival is all about Spanish and Latin American film with around 200 screenings throughout this week.

Twenty films are competing in the main competition for the coveted 'biznaga' prizes, named after and made in the shape of the iconic flowers made with jasmine that are traditionally sold in the city's streets.

The events got off the ground last Friday with the opening gala

THE STORY BEHIND A PLACE NAME

Cártama
From a village to a large Iberian town

The first records of the place name Cartima appear in Roman epigraphy, although the name has a clear Phoenician influence antine-Visigothic buildings. These are covered with more recent constructions such as the shrine of Nuestra Señora de los Remedios and the Renaissance parish church of San Pedro. Despite all these changes, the town's name has remained intact.

The name Cártama evolved from Cartima, a word with a long history that lends its name to a theatre and schools in the town. This place name has the same root as Carthage, an ancient city in North Africa (in present-day Tunisia) that was the capital of the Punic state founded by Phoenician emigrants.

Iberian town

As explained by the municipal archaeologist, Francisco Melero, this place name arose in the Phoenician-Punic context in the 6th century BCE.

"It is the moment in which the Phoenician colonisations of the south of the [Iberian] peninsula took place. Cártama was a village and later became an Iberian town, but the name has a clear Phoenician influence," he explained.

This root corresponds to populations that have the character of a city or large town, according to Melero.

"In Iberian times, Cartima became a large town. Although we do not have any Phoenician records that tell us, the origin is in that context."

The archaeologist points out that the name of Cartima does not appear in the works of the Greek or Latin authors "despite being an important town".

He says that the name appears for the first time in the Roman epigraphy found during the excavations of the ancient basilica. "We see it on the pedestals of statues of gods, such as Iunia Rústica, which reads: first and perpetual priestess of Cartima."

Thus, he says, the first empirical proof of this name are the Roman epigraphs.

Although the Hispano-Roman populations evolved towards the Visigoths and Byzantines, all of these new communities maintained the site and also the name. Cartima appears written in Islamic documents from the 9th and 10th centuries, in the context of the revolt of Omar ben Hafsún.

"There was a perpetuity in medieval times. It is significant that the Muslims, when they occupied the [Iberian] peninsula in the eighth century, also kept the name. At that time, remains of the Roman town were still visible."

Although the place name has Phoenician-Punic roots, the archaeologist explains the proof of a large town standing on the site in Iberian times.

"The necropolises that we have found were Iberian, and all the tombs have weapons and ceramics from those communities. It is a hybrid between the great city of the bay of Malaga, where the Phoenicians settled, and the Guadalhorce valley with its Iberian communities. This name is a paradigm that has many influences," he said.

ANDALUSIAN BIRD WATCH
PETER JONES

Eagles in the skies

The Andalucía Bird Society recommends looking out for raptors and large soaring birds as they return to Europe

March is the big birding hurrah as hundreds, sometimes thousands, of raptors and large soaring birds arrive daily to our shores here in Andalucía. As these birds arrive on their northern journey from Africa, birdwatchers from across Europe and beyond head in the opposite direction to witness this migration from the southernmost outpost of the Iberian Peninsula, where the shortest sea crossing between neighbouring Morocco and Spain exists and the 14km flyway concentrates gatherings of these large birds as they enter Europe. It is a spectacle and one of the many wonders of nature, truly an experience worth seeking by everyone.

Of course, many smaller birds will be making the same crossing over the Strait of Gibraltar with a great number choosing to make the journey at night-time to avoid predators under cover of darkness.

The short-toed eagle. PETER JONES

Throughout March to and including May, the spectacle of migration will be the focus of attention for a great many birdwatchers. I highly recommend readers spending a morning or even a whole day down on the southern coast between Algeciras and Tarifa, where there are many viewing points to see raptors in large numbers and at very close quarters.

I will be making an effort during March to visit Tarifa, but most of my days will be spent in my mountains as some of our birds are already beginning their breeding season and it is an opportunity for me to assess populations and be hopeful that numbers might increase on the previous year. I will be spending my time like some demented Mother Hen, worrying, and fretting over favourite birds, hoping they have survived the rigours of winter and hoping to renew my familiarity with specific pairs and individuals. It might be frowned upon in certain quarters, but I have been attracted to individual birds and enjoy reacquainting myself with these friends in the wild.

Another aspect covered by my wanderings in the mountains during March is the dazzling springtime flower show, coloured clusters of spring flowering plants that will be forming a veritable tapestry of vibrant colour on meadows and the understorey of our open woodlands.

I am hoping you will all enjoy the beginnings of our spring and find time to spend with our wonderful regional wildlife.

In Picasso’s footsteps... A fresh take on existential angst

OLIVER

Can you hear that flourish of paso doble-like drumrolls heralding Celebration Picasso 1973-2023: the international art scene’s grand parade of events linked to the 50th anniversary of the death of Malaga’s eternal “favourite son”? Brit fashion designer extraordinaire Paul Smith has given the Musée Picasso in Paris a multi-hued makeover featuring wallpaper that echoes his signature bright-coloured shirt stripes, and - speaking of jubilees - Museo Picasso Málaga will be celebrating its twentieth with two major tributes; the first (Picasso: Matter and Body) opens in May, heading next for Bilbao’s Guggenheim Museum, while the second will highlight the mega iconic artist’s influence on future generations.

In the same celebratory spirit, the Malagueta bullring’s Cultural Centre (Paseo Reding, 9) presents Picasso y los Años Dorados de la Costa Azul (Picasso and the Golden Years of the Côte d’Azur); this recently inaugurated exhibition incorporating 142 “Pablo moments” seized by Irish photographer Edward Quinn will be the perfect accompaniment to a festive Picassian bullfight scheduled on 8 April (the day of this eminently photogenic aficionado’s passing). Even the most adamant anti-corrida opponents may succumb to the charm of Quinn’s candidly captured family and celebrity snaps, filled with Mediterranean joie de vivre.

Ephemeral mural

What would Pablo Ruiz Picasso think of the profusion of art memes representing his world-famous Guernica as a symbol of present-day Disasters of War? Who knows? However, it is hardly surprising that his XXL oil on canvas unveiled at the Paris World Fair in 1937 - before being entrusted to New York’s MoMA during the Franco era, and finally entering the permanent collection of Madrid’s Reina Sofía museum - has continued to be a universal source of inspiration; often alluded to in street art and skate culture, it paved the way for the bold graphic effects and dramatic imagery deployed by urban artists today.

L’Émotion du Moment is the title of a collective project exploring the mood of the moment, to be seen until 27 May at the Alianza Francesa French language institute and cultural centre (Calle Canales, 11 - within steps of María Zambrano train station). Taking its cue from Fleurs du Mal (Flowers of Evil) poet Charles Baudelaire and the existential angst he expressed in numerous essays, the star attraction of this collaboration between YMAS (Young Malaga-based Artists) is a striking ephemeral mural. Perhaps because it consists of converging black and white symbols and distorted figures, Picasso’s Guernica springs to mind, but the comparison with the 20th century trailblazer stops there. The acute sense of terror and physical pain associated with the Civil War bombings is absent from this stream of consciousness collaboration spotlighting the mental health issues that affected so many youngsters under lockdown.

Tattoo artist Diego alias Flores Cósmico explains that his fellow participants, who all go by pseudonyms (Misfortune, Cristóbal Lápiz, Perpetual), pooled their resources, in “cocktail shaker” mode: “We brainstormed, each of us coming up with ideas, which we wove into the final result, using a projector.”

Nobody’s business

How would the creator of Guernica react to the news that one of France’s best-known conceptualists, Jean-Pierre Raynaud, has donated an artwork inspired by his anti-war masterpiece to Ukraine’s National Museum of Art? The author’s detractors consider that his “self-proclaimed homage” is out of place, that it has nothing in common with the original other than its dimensions (7.7 x 3.49 metres), whereas Raynaud claims that his updated version displaying no-entry signs and black bars on a white background is a protest against violence, no more no less: “I am not an anecdotal artist. I show the thought, not the details.”

Only 22 and Almost Famous (if you remember the movie, you’re showing your age...), Eva aka VAZ discussed her thought-provoking installation at Galería JM (Calle Duquesa de Parcent, 12 - in the arty Soho district - till 13 May), over a beer. A friend of Diego’s, VAZ rolled up her sleeve to reveal a tattoo by... guess who? Flores Cósmico.

The main thread of her basement show, incorporating black ink drawings of little “Nobodies” - caught in the labyrinth of existence (represented by expanses of parallel hatching or unbroken circular lines) - is the concept of “heterotopia” (alternative spaces within spaces) developed by French Theory philosopher Michel Foucault. “I fell in love with it, and took it one step further.”

About to move on, this Malaga-born English-speaker - a St George’s alumna, who studied fine art in Dublin and London as a teen - is the kind of kid who doesn’t stay in any one place too long. Next stop: Berlin, for a two-year art-related MA focusing on “space strategies”. What else?

The company has more than 20 years of experience in the hospital-engineering sector and has developed its own inverse osmosis and ultra-filtration systems for households

GRANADA

C.S. HS Group is an expert in water treatment. The company's founder, Heribert Schneider, has been working for more than 40 years in the sector. He started his career in the sewage, industrial and drinking-water treatment business. He has worked at the Aabachtalsperre Reservoir for the Bad Wünnenberg (West Germany) Water Association. It was there that Herr Schneider learnt about the quality and production of drinking water and how to measure and control permanently water quality. His professional expertise has been mainly focussed on water treatment and separation in international projects. Since 2010 Heribert has been living in Spain, more precisely in Granada, where he founded his company. Since its formation, the principal line of business has been in hospital engineering; developing water purification equipment and the treatment of dangerous liquids produced by clinical analysis laboratories. Some of the most well-known hospitals in Spain have benefitted from HS Group's technology. Its systems, to create ultrapure and pure water, are presently installed in more than 40 hospitals across Spain.

HS Group continues innovating and has now transferred the same technology used in hospitals to the home. "We can offer individual machines which produce from one to 500 litres of purified water an hour. We can offer both standard and made-to-measure systems" explains Herr Schneider. These purifiers are able to remove lime, "we can soften hard water, especially in the coastal areas, and can use inverse osmosis to purify tap water and remove any kind of impurities". One of the main advantages of these systems is their easy installation and price. "We are manufacturers, this means that our machines are very affordable and do not need specialist maintenance".

One could say that Heribert Schneider has dedicated his life to water. His innovative water-purification systems have even travelled to Haiti. A hundred of his mobile purification systems, which do not need electricity, were donated to Caritas to combat the spread of cholera in that country.

Heribert Schneider.

Water is the fountain of life and the German businessman is a shining example of this. Thanks to his machines, thousands of people benefit, on a daily basis, from quality water which is now available as well to private households.

Exotic Bromeliads

Bromeliads are epiphytic, which means they grow in small pockets of soil trapped in clefts in rocks, tree branches etc but they are not parasitic. This example, a bird's nest bromeliad, was photographed by Sue Chapman who says, "this is growing in a pot on my terrace and has been out a couple of weeks now".

GARDENING
The tree tomato

Solanum betaceum (synonym Cyphomandra betaceum and often called tomatillo or tree tomato) is a small tree or shrub native to the Andes and found in Ecuador, Colombia, Peru, Chile, Argentina, Bolivia and Indonesia. Although not frost hardy, it reportedly will survive temperatures as low as -2C, making it suitable for some inland areas as well as the coast of southern Spain. A member of the potato family (Solanaceae), the tree tomato will reach a height of around five metres in ideal conditions, although around two metres is more common. It is evergreen but in cold winters may drop some of its leaves. The leaves are large (up to 30cm by 20cm) and heart-shaped and covered with fine hairs.

From spring through to late summer, clusters of fragrant flowers up to 1cm across form. These are followed by glossy fruits which resemble a plum tomato. When ripe they are red or orange, as is the flesh, and are said to be aromatic with a sweet-sour flavour. In Indonesia they are used to make a chutney but they can also be used in sweet dishes such as ice-cream and jam. The fruits have a thin skin which is quite bitter but easily removed by submerging in boiling water.

An ideal location for a tree tomato would be in a spot that gets plenty of sun in the mornings and some shade in the afternoon. Solanum betaceum is not drought resistant and will need regular watering in the summer. It is not fussy about soil type but one with plenty of organic matter added is preferable.

The tree tomato is shallow rooted and may need staking in windy areas. It can be grown in the ground in temperate areas or in a large pot so it can be moved into a sheltered location in the winter.

Feeding every three weeks during the growing season and regularly pruning the branches will promote growth although a new tree may not fruit for two years while getting established.

Propagation is by cuttings or by seed.

The cast of My Fair Lady outside the Salón Varietés Theatre in Fuengirola during a dress rehearsal. SUR

Humorous tale of rags to riches comes to the Salón Varietés

The theatre's latest production, My Fair Lady, tells the story of the bizarre relationship of a high-society professor and a cockney flower girl

TONY BRYANT

FUENGIROLA. The Salón Varietés Theatre in Fuengirola will launch the first of one of its "big three" shows this weekend, a ten-night performance of the popular musical, My Fair Lady, which runs from tonight (Friday) until Sunday 26 March.

Ranked among the top 100 greatest American films of all time, the production is based on George Bernard Shaw's 1913 play Pygmalion, the amusing story of Eliza Doolittle, a cockney flower girl at Covent Garden market who meets the esteemed professor of speech and linguistics, Henry Higgins.

After being ridiculed by his colleague Colonel Pickering about Eliza's unrefined language skills and equally brash character, Higgins claims that he will teach Eliza to speak like a lady of the highest society within six months.

Eliza, intrigued, accepts, although her father attempts to capitalise on Eliza's new life-style. Eliza persists and blossoms into a lady ready for Royal Ascot and a Royal Ball. She catches the eye of Freddie Enysford Hill and, smitten by her beauty and her cockney small talk, pursues and eventually persuades her to begin a life with him.

Rags to riches tale

The Salón Varietés Theatre's production of this well-loved, amusing, rags-to-riches tale takes inspiration from both the stage and film versions and will include exquisite costumery, musical production and choreography.

The production is directed by John Gale and consists of a talented ensemble of singers, dancers and actors led by Costa favourite Melissa Carver as Eliza Doolittle. The cast will also include Tim Alexander as Henry Higgins, Peter Oliver as Colonel Pickering, Keith Spitalnick as Alfred Doolittle, Sheila Sanderson-Wohlmuth as Mrs Pierce, Nathan Homan as Freddie Enysford Hill, along with a supporting cast of around 15 performers.

With musical direction by James Burn and choreography by Alexandra Avery, the show is full of musical theatre favourites, such as Wouldn't it be Lovely, The Rain in Spain, I Could Have Danced All Night and Get Me to the Church on Time, among others.

The show will start each night at 7.30pm, (Sunday 7pm), while on Saturday 25 March the performance will take place at 2pm.

Tickets, which cost 20 euros, can be reserved on www.salon-varietes.com, or from the theatre's box office Monday to Friday between 11am and 2.30pm. Early reservations are recommended.

People with restricted mobility who require wheelchair space must make their reservation at the box office and not online (Box office call: 952 474542).

The ARCH team at the Rescue Centre for Horses and Donkeys are open Sundays and volunteers are on hand to explain the charity's work. More information on Facebook: Centro Andalusi de Rescate de Caballos or www.horserescuespain.org

Vaping, not as harmless as people think

Fashionable. Scientists have found that vaping is not as innocuous as it seems and can damage lungs and impede breathing

It seems that vaping isn't as innocuous as it seems. Health care professionals have been warning about this ever since vaping began to be fashionable, over ten years ago now, and new scientific evidence has provided additional data about how harmful it can be.

A study by the Lawson Health

Research Institute, one of the most prestigious in Canada, has concluded that vaping can damage what is known as the pulmonary surfactant, a substance in the lungs which is needed to facilitate the respiratory function. A lack of it can make breathing difficult, or even impossible.

The authors of the work, which has been published in the renowned Plos One magazine, admit that there is still no scientific evidence to confirm this

BE CAREFUL WITH VAPING

What's wrong with it

A starting point, for an addiction to tobacco

A study by the Spanish Society of GPs (SemFYC) showed that 80% of teenagers who take up smoking started by using electronic cigarettes. One in every two say they have vaped occasionally or on a regular basis.

Harm, not as much but still a lot

Vaping appears to cause less damage than tobacco, because you inhale fewer toxic substances. But it is not innocuous. E-cigarettes also contain nicotine, and propylene glycol turns into drops (vapour) when it reaches 300 degrees, but solidifies when the temperature drops to 36 and turns into a deposit on the lungs.

And also, environmental damage

Cigarette ends are considered the biggest waste product on the planet and one of those that contaminate the most. Those from electronic cigarettes are made of plastic and most of them can only be used once.

other words checked by another research team who carry out exactly the same procedures to see if they reach the same conclusions, any science requires years of monitoring before the evidence can be considered conclusive. That is how scientific method works.

Nevertheless, practically all the studies carried out since electronic cigarettes appeared on the market point in the same direction: vaping is also harmful to health, as specialist Joseba Zabala, of the National Committee for the Prevention of Smoking (CNPT), has pointed out.

Some studies, although they are fewer in number, have preferred to focus on the advantages of this type of device to help people give up smoking.

Most of those are financed by the tobacco industry, "which has the greatest interest in extending vaping," says Zabala.

"They have found it to be a real bonanza. More than 80 per cent of new smokers, especially adolescents, start by using e-cigarettes, but what they think of as something innocuous can end up as an addiction".

Pulmonary surfactant is a critical element in the complex machinery that enables human beings to breathe. The name refers to a layer of phospholipids and proteins that covers the lungs and enables people to breathe with minimum effort. Without it, respiration would only be possible through mechanical ventilation.

Breathing

The group from the Lawson Institute which has produced this work, in which the Western University's Schulich School of Medicine and Odontology also participated, specialises in the study of surfactant.

"We realised that the first thing the vapour aerosol comes into contact with when it enters the lungs is this layer of lipids and proteins," explains Ruud Veldhuizen, the scientist behind the research.

The team examined different vaping devices and also flavours, additives and even nicotine, to determine the effects that each had on the surfactant.

What they found was that the liquids which are used in electronic cigarettes "do not have worse effects than nicotine, but some of the flavourings used, such as menthol, do," they said.

The group suspects that it is this damage that explains why people who vape have a greater susceptibility to developing pulmonary lesions, especially those who have been affected by respiratory viruses such as Covid.

"Our obligation is to make this information known. People have to know that vaping can be harmful for the lungs," Veldhuizen says.

One of the possible causes of this lung damage is, Joseba Zabala says, something called propylene glycol, an additive which is authorised by the health authorities for use in food but not for inhaling.

This product, the same one that rock groups use to make the stage appear smoky during concerts, is what the e-cigarettes use to provide the false sensation of exhaling smoke.

"It is not innocuous," these scientists have concluded. It irritates the eyes, the throat and now they know that it can also damage the respiratory tract as well.

Cases of scalp ringworm caught at low-cost hairdressers, experts warn

Dermatologists in Spain have seen numerous patients with this contagious condition recently, all of them male with undercut, slicked-back hairstyles

IVÁN GELIBTER

It could be psoriasis or seborrheic dermatitis, but if a reddish circle appears on the back of the neck it may be something different. Dermatologists in Malaga are warning that there have been dozens of cases of tinea capitis recently; otherwise known as ringworm, this is a contagious condition caused by a fungus which affects the scalp, and practically all the patients these specialists have seen have something in common: they have been going to low-cost hairdressers to have and maintain an undercut, slicked-back hairstyle.

Dr José Ignacio Galvañ, who was one of the first dermatologists in Spain to detect this outbreak, says that for years the main cause of tinea capitis was through zoophilic fungi such as Microsporum canis, which is very common in animals and especially cats. However, after a while he began to suspect that these cases were different and the clinic he runs started to carry out their own mycological testing.

"We can say clearly that we are seeing an increase in tinea capitis due to an anthropophilic species of fungus," he says. In other words, it is passed from person to person, rather than from an animal to a human.

This type of tinea has been very common in Africa and the USA for some years now, but it was very unusual in Spain or elsewhere in Europe.

After investigating further, Dr Galvañ was able to confirm that this type of ringworm which affects the scalp is called Trichophyton tonsurans. In his clinic alone he has seen dozens of recent cases, and it became obvious that there was a pattern: every one of these patients was a male who had had an undercut, slicked-back hairstyle.

This is a style which is in fashion internationally, with short, shaved hair at the sides and back of the head and long on the top and in the front. It means going to the hairdresser at least once a week to maintain it, and that can increase the contact the client has with razors which are infected.

In 100 per cent of these cases seen at Dr Galvañ's clinic, the patients had gone to a low-cost hairdresser.

"We examined and carried out tests on all the patients," says this specialist. The test is a simple and painless technique which involves taking a scraping from the affected area and then analysing it.

Anthropophilic fungus

"This is what helped us to realise that we were looking at an anthropophilic fungus, where the infection is passed from one person to another, and not the zoophilic type which people catch from animals," Dr Galvañ explains.

The most common symptoms of this ringworm are scaly lesions to the back and sides of the head. They look very similar to psoriasis or seborrheic dermatitis, and that led some specialists to treat the condition with topical corticosteroids. "That actually made it worse," he admits.

"Less frequently, patients came with inflammatory tinea or the so-called black dot tinea, where the affected area appears to be speckled with black dots," he says. The latter, which are sometimes imperceptible, often act as asymptomatic carriers.

Far from being identified at

José Ignacio Galvañ

Tests on the patients revealed that this type of ringworm is spread from one person to another and not caught from animals just one clinic, cases of scalp ringworm have been detected all over the province, the Dermatology Department at the Clínico Hospital has confirmed. In recent months specialists there have seen a significant increase in cases.

Although as yet there are no specific figures, the dermatologists agree that the patient profile is the same: men who have had an undercut, slicked-back hairstyles at low-cost hairdressers.

Chain of transmission

For this reason, Dr Galvañ says it is important for hairdressers to be aware of this problem, and the health authorities must be able to identify and cut off the chain of transmission.

He also recommends that if anyone suspects that they may have tinea capitis, they should consult a specialist.

With regard to the short-term future, Dr Galvañ presented a report on this situation at the annual meeting of the Spanish Academy of Dermatology and Venereology in Granada on 10 and 11 March, to call for further study and improved approach to what he describes as an "epidemic" which is occurring for the first time ever in Spain.

At the meeting he was awarded a prize for the Best Scientific Study Award for his pioneering research carried out in his private practice between 2021 and 2022, "with his own resources and for the love of medicine".

He studied twenty-six cases of this contagious disease and found that in most cases, the patients were asymptomatic. Thirty-eight per cent were diagnosed with tinea capitis, an eczema-like skin complaint. But he also found cases of tinea connubialis, in which the patient was affected after their partner had gone to the hairdresser (31%); inflammatory ringworm (8%), and even a case of a one-year-old girl with what appeared to be a cradle cap, which finally turned out to be ringworm which she had caught from her father.

He advised people to buy their own hair clippers and take them to the salon.

The cream of the cream

ANDREW J. LINN

How would the history of sherry have turned out if Britain had not been such an important consumer of Jerez wines.

While other northern European countries drank sherry because it was cheap and high in alcohol, the British market was based on quality.

The great sherry houses were founded by the English and the Scots, begging Pedro Domecq's pardon of course, but he did have an English partner. Of course, the taste back then was for sweet varieties, and finos and manzanillas were hardly exported.

Although we are now quite open to occasionally drinking sweet wines with dishes like foie gras and blue cheese, it has generally been consigned to the little old ladies' favourite tippie.

The House of Harvey was established in Bristol in 1871, the port being the destination of wines shipped from Spain, and the brand that made its name was Bristol Cream, a blend from 30 different barrels of varying ages.

It soon gained popularity worldwide, creating a new category of wine, cream sherry.

Harvey's Bristol Cream achieved a royal warrant in 1895 from Queen Victoria, continuing to leave its mark on history in 2013, when it was chosen to commemorate the 60th anniversary of the late Queen's coronation.

Perhaps uniquely it was served with ice and a twist of orange peel, allegedly the way her late majesty enjoyed it.

Ever inventive, the brand makeover brought with it a facility that many types of wine would benefit from: the label turns blue when the contents of the bottle have reached the correct drinking temperature.

WINE OF THE WEEK

Harvey's Bristol Cream

Possibly one the most popular sherry brands outside Spain, it is 17.5° alcohol, and the price varies widely, averaging around 12 euros. Usual taste of raisins, nuts, prunes, figs, and definitely for the sweeter tooth.

Fuengirola business scoops trophy for best chocolate ice cream in Spain

A Costa del Sol ice cream parlour beat off stiff competition from 150 participants to win the national contest run by Helado Artesano FUENGIROLA. The best chocolate ice cream in Spain is made and sold in Fuengirola. The Caramelo ice cream parlour has just won first prize in a contest organised by the specialist magazine Helado Artesano in which more than 150 professionals from all over Spain took part.

New recipe

The product made by the artisan Matias Kuyumdjian was crowned the best in the country during an event held at the end of February at the Atalaya Park hotel in Estepona. The professional won with a recipe that he had been working on for four months and that he had only just included in his business offering.

"It is a mixture of pure chocolates from different origins," he revealed without giving further details about its preparation.

With the trophy in hand, he explained that the contest had two different phases: on the first day, the judges marked the contestants on an ice cream of their choice, between mango and dulce de leche.

Matias was second with his dulce de leche and therefore went through to the final. In the last round, the chosen flavour was chocolate, and his came out the winner.

"There was a high level of competition and just reaching the final was a source of pride," he admitted. However, being judged the winner "is a massive prestige on a personal level, beating so many renowned people".

The business opened in April 2019, just before the pandemic, and despite this it has made a name for itself in the neighbourhood.

After winning the award, both the chocolate flavour and the dulce de leche flavour ice creams have been incorporated into the menu (previously other recipes were used) and they are both going down well with the customers.

Young debutant rescues a point at the home of the league leaders

Álex Calvo, 19, scored the equaliser in the 86th minute, three minutes after coming onto the field for Malaga

2-2
LAS PALMAS-MALAGA

DARYL FINCH

MALAGA. It was a night to remember for Álex Calvo, the 19-year-old making his debut for Malaga. The young full-back ensured his side returned home from the Canaries with a point after his superb last-gasp equaliser sealed a 2-2 draw against league leaders Las Palmas on Saturday night.

Having come into this match-day 10 points from safety, Malaga would have held little hope of getting anything out of this game. And things went exactly to the script early on, when Julián Delmás handled the ball in the area in an action missed by practically everyone on the field - but not the VAR.

Veteran Las Palmas captain

Álex Calvo about to fire the ball into the net for the equaliser. AGENCIA LOF

Jonathan Viera tucked the penalty away straight down the middle - a massive setback for the Blue and Whites after just four minutes.

With the hosts on the front foot, Pejiño could have doubled his side's lead with an instep shot from the right-hand side of the area, but keeper Rubén Yáñez got down quick to block.

A route back into the game

Then, practically out of nowhere, came Malaga's chance to get back into the game. Again, it was the VAR who intervened, deciding that Juande had been fouled by keeper Álvaro Valles as he rose to attempt to punch a hopeful long ball punted into his penalty area.

Having decided that the keeper had only succeeded in wiping out the Malaga defender, it was down to striker Fran Sol to take the spot-kick - and he did so with aplomb, sending the hapless keeper the wrong way.

Malaga could have gone in at the break with the lead had Fran Sol kept his composure just before half time. Instead, the forward volleyed Fran Villalba's perfectly weighted cross over the bar from barely six yards out.

With the scores level, the second half was cagey, with neither side seemingly willing to take any risks to break the deadlock. It became increasingly clear that something spectacular was required to get the go-ahead goal.

And so it proved. Pejiño, who was constantly a threat cutting in from the right, did exactly that, before unleashing a fearsome strike from 25 yards out. A goal worthy of winning any game.

Game-changing substitution

But then, in the 83rd minute, Malaga coach Sergio Pellicer brought Álex Calvo onto the field for his debut. At just 1.70 metres and with a thick mane of hair, the left-sider not only looked like a young Lionel Messi, but he channelled him too just minutes later.

After expertly controlling the ball, Calvo burst through the smallest of gaps between Álex Suárez and Eric Curbelo, leaving him free in front of goal to poke the ball through the legs of the keeper and ensure a share of the spoils at the Estadio de Gran Canaria.

After last week's setback against fellow strugglers Racing Santander, this point gives Malaga a slight glimmer of hope, albeit mostly in terms of a morale boost.

The Blue and Whites are 10 points from safety as Levante come to La Rosaleda tonight (9pm).

Real Madrid defy age and logic

They'll arrive having written the 'How To Win The Champions League' manual

Forget the Emmy-winning story of how the veteran Chicago Bulls team won one final NBA championship - Real Madrid are about to top 'The Last Dance'.

Not everyone recognises the greatness we are witnessing as Carlo Ancelotti's team defy age and logic to make a charge for the club's 15th European title.

At the time of writing, the bookies make them third-favourites but I'm backing them to retain the crown.

It's crazy really! The team should have been broken up a couple of years ago based on the number of miles on the clock, yet this collection of individuals is built for the Champions League.

The demands of week-in, week-out endeavours in La Liga is catching up with the golden oldies and so Ancelotti needs to manage their minutes. The team is built to peak once every couple of mid-weeks when top-level football resembles chess on a green baize. It's more about thinking and calculation. Real Madrid are the masters of this.

Luka Modrić is proving to still be the best midfielder in the world, even at the age of thirty-seven. Karim Benzema is a couple of years younger and living up to his Ballon d'Or reputation. These are just two of the seven players over the age of 30 in the starting line-up who beat Liverpool this week.

Given the age of the main players, this shouldn't be possible. The Modrić-Toni Kroos-Casemiro axis was finally broken up, but it was the junior member of the trio who was sold to Manchester United.

Aurélien Tchouaméni and Eduardo Camavinga are the heirs, but have to fight for a single spot alongside Modrić and Kroos. They are institutions at the institution.

Cleverly, Ancelotti is transitioning the club. Tchouaméni and Camavinga are being teased into the team; Uruguayan Fede Valverde is now a prominent player.

Ancelotti and Júnior. SUR

Vinícius Júnior is on the verge of attaining galáctico status. In fact, his manager claims he's already a legend for scoring the winner in last season's Champions League final. It does seem like he's been around for ages; but only last year, he became the youngest scorer in a final since Lionel Messi.

Vini Jr isn't in the class of Messi or his predecessor Cristiano Ronaldo, but that is the secret to his success, they are a team. It's a collective that is bigger than one single player.

I've praised him enough in this column so let's quote Jürgen Klopp: "Carlo is the most relaxed manager I've met in my life. His man management is on a completely different level to anyone."

It's like the Real Madrid team is a listed building and he's rebuilding it brick-by-brick rather than a demolition.

I've submitted this article before the draw for the quarters and semi. It doesn't matter who they face, Real Madrid will arrive having written the instruction manual on "How to win the Champions League".

We are in the midst of greatness. Step aside Michael Jordan, Scottie Pippen and Denis Rodman - these are the stars of 'One Last Dance: The Sequel'.

MÁLAGA. The climax of the action at the Cártama Cricket Oval is now on the horizon as the majority of the European Cricket League group stage action is brought to a close.

During the past week, Dreux (France) beat Forfarshire (Scotland) by 30 runs to win Group D last Saturday.

Meanwhile, on Wednesday, Group E went in favour of Roma CC (Italy). They beat Zagreb Sokol (Croatia) by a convincing 82 runs in the group final.

For the remainder of this week, CIYMS (Ireland), Punjab Lions Nicosia (Cyprus), Ariana KIF (Sweden), Istanbul KSK (Turkey) and Oeiras (Portugal) will be battling it out in Group F, the final of which will take place on Saturday.

Championship Week

From Monday until Friday next week, all of the group winners until now will face off in the so-called Championship Week.

Five games per day will take place, with action commencing at 11.30am, 1.30pm, 3.30pm, 5.30pm and 7.30pm.

The final day, Friday, will see two qualifiers and an eliminator before the grand final at 7.30pm.

The local padel player, alongside partner Marta Ortega, lost out in the final of the La Rioja Open 1000 on Sunday in Argentina

MARINA RIVAS. Malaga padel player Bea González and partner Marta Ortega, from Madrid, narrowly missed out on their first title of the season, having to settle for second place in the first women's World Padel Tour tournament to be held in Argentina.

Sunday's final, held in front of a passionate crowd of almost 15,000 spectators at the Super Domo in La Rioja, saw the young pairing fall in a hard-fought duel of more than two hours and three sets to compatriots Gemma Triay and Ale Salazar (6-7, 6-4, 6-1).

González and Ortega started off on the front foot in the first set, which, through pure persis-

In the second set, the same tone was maintained. However, thanks to Triay's pure power, their opponents managed to break the number three pairing's serve and take the second set (6-4).

The third set was all or nothing. But it was Triay and Salazar who had the coolest heads and, without making any unforced errors, they sealed the 6-1 win.

In the end, González and Ortega had to settle for the runners-up spot, but can come away with the feeling that they're now competing at a very high level. To be in contention for titles just two tournaments into the Tour shows how far they've come.

Luis Ángel Maté denied chance to end career at this year's Vuelta a España

CYCLING

P. L. ALONSO. Marbella cyclist Luis Ángel Maté looks to have been denied the chance to compete in one last major race before he retires. This is because the 78th edition of La Vuelta a España, which will start in Barcelona on 26 August and run until 17 September, won't feature Maté's team Euskaltel, race organisers announced last week.

Following the rules of the International Cycling Union, the 18 UCI WorldTour teams automatically participate in the race. They are AG2R Citroën Team, Alpecin-Deceuninck, Astana, Bahrain Victorious, Bora-Hansgrohe, Cofidis, EF Education-Easypost, Groupama-FDJ, Ineos Grenadiers, Intermarché-Circus-Wanty, Jumbo-Visma; Movistar Team, Soudal Quick-Step, Team Arkea-Samsic, Team DSM, Team Jayco Alula, Trek - Segafredo and UAE Team Emirates.

Two more spots are filled by the two best UCI ProTeams in the 2022 UCI Ranking - in this case the Lotto Dstny and TotalEnergies teams. The remaining two spots are filled by invited teams. Euskaltel was expected to be one of them, but missed out to Burgos and Caja Rural.

"It would be an extraordinary cherry on top of the cake to finish my career in Madrid in La Vuelta," Maté recently told SUR in an interview. However, it now seems that his chance to compete in another race of this calibre before he calls it a day has now gone.

That said, at 39 years of age, the rider can boast of having completed eleven editions of the Vuelta a España and six of the Tour de France, as well as never having retired in a 'grand tour'.

Malaga golfer Ana Peláez's excellent form continues in South Africa

GOLF

JUAN CALDERÓN. Ana Peláez secured a third, top-five finish in her last four tournaments by coming second in the Investec South African Women's Open, an event included in the Ladies European Tour calendar, as it concluded on Saturday.

The Malaga-born golfer finished on -18, four strokes behind local player Ashleigh Buhai, who was unstoppable in the final round.

This performance ensured that Peláez's excellent start to the season continues.

Having also come second in the Joburg Open a week previously, Peláez is now in second place in the 'Race to Costa del Sol', the order of merit of the Ladies European Tour, which comes with 250,000 euros of prize money for the top three players of the year.

BATTLESHIPS

Instructions Find where the fleet of ships (1 battleship, 2 cruisers, 3 destroyers, 4 submarines) are hidden in the grid. The numbers to the right of and below the grid indicate how many of the squares in that row are filled in with ships or parts of ships. The ships do not touch each other, even diagonally. Some have been filled in to start you off.

THE SUR IN ENGLISH COLUMN

Tell them where you saw it!

It's no secret that a free newspaper survives off its advertising revenue and at SUR in English we are proud that our advertisers choose us as the best vehicle to take their message out to potential customers. Early every Friday morning their name, their brand, their logo, their services and their products leave the printers inside each one of 30,000 copies and head out across Andalucía and Gibraltar. Later, at our hundreds of distribution points, the newspaper complete with our advertisers' message inside is picked up by readers, many as part of their Friday morning routine they haven't changed in years.

We know our advertisers are already aware just how far their name travels inside these pages, but when you call them to make an appointment or book a table, when you walk through their showroom doors or buy a ticket, don't forget to tell them that you saw their ad in SUR in English.

The seven differences

It is dawn in Alhaurín el Grande. In Camino de la Fuente del Perro, a rural area less than ten minutes from the town centre, daily prayers begin at 7.30am in one of the most unusual parts of this residential development: a Buddhist temple which stands out among the small houses and olive groves due to its height. Inside, residents practise the teachings of Buddha before the working day begins at 9am, the time when they all do something for the community.

At the temple, they are welcomed by Guen Kelsang Chokga, a Kadampa Buddhist nun and resident teacher at the temple, who is also the spiritual director of the New Kadampa Tradition for Spain and Portugal.

This branch, which adapts the teachings of Buddha to contemporary society, began in Spain 25 years ago. Now, Malaga has become world famous for this modern branch of Buddhism and the temple in Alhaurín el Grande is the largest of this faith in Europe.

Beyond the religion, it aims to be a space which is open to everyone who wants to explore meditation more deeply and free their mind from the stresses of everyday life. They can go as a visitor, volunteer, habitual resident or a student on a weekend course.

"We place the emphasis on meditation, on listening to the teachings and putting them into practice, and we want to be open to the public. You don't have to believe in it, simply try it, and if it works for you then use it," says Guen Kelsang Chokga, who started studying the teachings of Buddha in 1998.

Beside the spacious temple, which is very light due to the dome made of glass windows, stand three small buildings with the names of Buddha's pure lands: Potala, Tushita and Keajra. This area is the epicentre of life in the community, and is where the residents and visitors stay.

"At present about 20 of us are living here. There is a very good atmosphere and we all help out," says Stephanie, who runs the temple in Alhaurín and has lived there since 2014.

The community work begins at 9am and takes place in the different areas of the retreat. An image of the founding master of the tradition presides over the altar of the temple, where the teachings of Buddha are also located, with the books which are used daily in the meditations and offering bowls.

Mateo is in charge of tidying these and keeping them clean, and it is one of his favourite tasks within the community.

"In 2016 I started to study the tradition in Barcelona. Last year my partner and I came to a festival at this temple and we loved it, so now we are continuing our study programme here," says this former entrepreneur in the export sector who decided to change his life because its frantic pace was hard to cope with. "I was doing well, but I needed to stop. This life brings you a great deal of peace and tranquility," he explains.

dents, those who do contribute something financially to the community. But another way of living this experience in the Alhaurín temple is to be a volunteer like Marina, 26, who is Argentinian. We talked to her in the 'café of peace', the cafeteria at the centre.

"I have come for a week. I'm not a Buddhist and I don't know much about it, but I heard about this temple at a meditation centre in Malaga and wanted to come and see what it was like. It has been a really good experience," she said.

Volunteers

Volunteers who come for a week work six hours a day. Outside working hours they can participate in the classes and meditation sessions organised by the centre, and they have two days off a week to explore the area or to rest.

About 11.30am it is time for a coffee break in the private dining room. All the residents and volunteers meet there as part of their coexistence experience.

"We chat and get to know each other better, for about 15 minutes," says Miguel, who returns to the kitchen once the break is over. He was an officer in the Local Police force in Granada and decided to change his life by taking a sabbatical which would enable him to live in the Buddhist centre in Alhaurín.

"I heard about this place a few years ago at a meditation centre in Granada. I felt I needed a new path in life; my work was really stressful. I started coming here to Malaga sometimes, and then an opportunity came up for me to stay. I enjoy cooking," he says.

These days there are 1,300 centres around the world where people can study and practise modern Kadampa Buddhism in the local language. Most are centres for study and meditation.

There are also six 'temples for world peace', based on the sacred mandala of Buddha Heruka, including this one in Alhaurín el Grande.

There are open days on Thursdays, Saturdays and Sundays, including a guided tour and free meditation class.
